Student charged in fraternity thefts

BY TIMOTHY W. KIRK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A Bucknell student has been charged with three counts each of burglary (felony) and theft by unlawful taking of movable property (misdemeanor) in the highly publicized fraternity thefts of May 1, 1992.

Mark Danzi '94 waived his right to a preliminary hearing and posted $10,000 bail during arraignment on May 21 before District Justice Leo S. Armbruster.

Police apprehended Danzi following a successful internal investigation by the Bucknell Department of Security and Public Safety, according to Director Vincent DeCerchio.

"I am pleased that our efforts resulted in the apprehension of a suspect," said DeCerchio following the incident. "We are, of course, disappointed that it is one of our own students. Things like this only serve to damage the community. It's a hollow victory."

Danzi, a sophmore at the time, allegedly stole seventeen compact discs from a private room in the Kappa Sigma fraternity house between the hours of 9:00 p.m. April 30 and 1:00 a.m. May 1.

Danzi then allegedly proceeded to the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity house, stealing eighteen compact discs valuing $257.00 and a television set from two separate rooms between the hours of 2:00 a.m. and 5:00 a.m. on May 1.

> "I am pleased that our efforts resulted in the apprehension of a suspect ... We are, of course, disappointed that it is one of our own students."
> —Vincent DeCerchio Director of Security and Public Safety

Danzi's attorney has reccomended his client be declared an accelerated rehabilitative disposition (ARD), which would result in a fine and parole, weakening or eliminating a prison sentence. ARD requires approval from both the parole officer and the investigating officer.

At the time of press, the parole officer had granted approval, and further movement on the case rested in the hands of the investigating officer, who was unavailable for comment.

Graduation of Class of '96 to mark Bucknell's 150th anniversary

BY MARIA GLOD AND JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The class of 1996 will become a permanent part of Bucknell history when they graduate, as the school celebrates its sesquicentennial and remembers its past.

The incoming 896 students will be the 150th graduating class when they walk across the stage in four years.

Bucknell's roots extend back to February 5, 1846 when the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania chartered the University at Lewisburg to provide an education for the growing denomination of Pennsylvania Baptists, according to University literature.

The University struggled through the Civil War period and came perilously close to bankruptcy in the years that followed. In the 1880's, however, David Jayne Hill became, at 29, the University President, and sought the financial assistance of his friend William Bucknell, a Baptist from Philadelphia.

Bucknell pledged $50,000 to the Board of Trustees in 1881, effectively saving the school from bankruptcy. The school changed its name to Bucknell University in 1886 as a result of this, and other contributions.

The University at Lewisburg began as two schools, a men's college and a seperate female institute, until 1855 when the two schools were combined.

Board at the school cost $1.25 per week, and tuition was $36 annually.

Women had to obtain the permission of the principle to be in the company of a gentleman.

According to the University literature, "If any student at U. at L. got caught bagging classes, pulling all-nighters, getting drunk at parties, or even going for a study break with a member of the opposite sex, he or she would at best be put on probation, and at worst be thrown out of the college."

Phi Psi was the first Greek organization at the University, founded in 1855, and quickly followed by Sigma Chi and Phi Gamma Delta. The first sororities were Pi Beta Phi, Alpha Chi Omega and Delta Delta Delta.

With the sesquicentennial four years away, the Class of '96 will close a chapter in Bucknell's history.

Students find new homes

Faculty to vote on calendar changes

Jan Plan forces restructuring

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Class of 1996 most likely will be the last freshman class at Bucknell to have the opportunity to experience the University's traditional January Program.

For the past 30 years, students have had the option of returning to campus during January to pursue research projects or to enroll in specially designed mini-courses.

> Restructuring options include implementing two 14-week semesters with the students returning to campus in the middle of January, or moving the January program to the end of the second semester.

The 1992-93 school year will be the last calendar to include the January Program.

Mike Thomas '94, Bucknell Student Government (BSG) President feels that the abolishment of the January program will affect the students as well as all individual campus groups, ranging from professors using the time to prepare for upcoming courses to winter season athletic teams' practice and competition schedules.

The faculty is expected to vote on the new academic calendar, with the Jan Plan eliminated, shortly after classes resume on Tuesday, Sept 1.

Their options include implementing two 14-week semesters with the students returning to campus in the middle of January, or moving the January program to the end of the second semester.

A third option is to have a short two week January program for students, particularly freshmen, to sharpen their reading, writing and study skills.

According to Larry Shinn, Vice President for Academic Affairs, the calendar revisions, if approved by the end of the October faculty meeting, will then be passed on to the Board of Trustees who will vote in November to accept or reject the plan. Only if the Trustees approve the revised calendar will a year without the Jan Plan become official University policy.

Colin Bridgewater —The Bucknellian

According to VIce-President for Academic Affairs Larry Shinn (above, left), the faculty is scheduled to pass a revised academic calendar in October.

The Committee on Instruction, chaired by Professor Ben Marsh, introduced a series of motions last spring that moved to abolish the January Program from the University calendar.

After debating the issue, the majority of the faculty voted to approve the motion to eliminate the program.

The faculty is still undecided, however, on the Committee's third motion, which addresses the logistics of the aforementioned calendar motion.

Their decision on this final motion will be instrumental in determining the starting and finishing dates of the upcoming academic years.

Two injured in Rt. 15 accident Wednesday

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A first year student and his father were injured in a two-car crash Wednesday when a truck collided with the van they were driving on Route 15.

John Stinchcombe '96, and his father, William, were transported to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment after the accident, according to East Buffalo Township Officer Robert Hoffman.

The elder Stinchcombe was immediately operated on to repair his badly injured knee, and the student was treated for cuts and bruises on his right side and two chipped teeth, according to John Dunlop, Dean of Students.

Neither the student nor his father are expected to be released from the hospital until Saturday, according to Dean Dunlop.

The accident occurred when Franklin L. Zimmerman, 60, heading South, ran a red light at the intersection of Moore Avenue and Route 15 and collided with the left front end of the van driven by the student's father, according to Officer Hoffman.

The Stinchcombes were returning from Bucknell West, where the students' sister, Marjorie '93, lives, when the accident occurred, according to Dean Dunlop.

Zimmerman was charged with running a red light, and was not injured in the crash, according to Officer Hoffman.

Orientation staff greets new students

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While the incoming students were packing their bags and saying goodbye to high school friends, the orientation staff was busy preparing to welcome new students to campus.

Scheduled activities include open houses, campus tours, and social events planned from Thursday, August 27 to Saturday, September 5.

> "The big picture orientation task is to prepare new students to become members of the academic community ... If they feel more comfortable in the community they will be better students."
> —Ruth Burnham Associate Dean of Student Life

"The big picture orientation task is to prepare new students to become members of the academic community," said Ruth Burnham, Associate Dean of Student Life. "If they feel more comfortable in the community they will be better students.

"I am pleased with the degree of student responsibility in running the program," she added.

The orientation staff is composed of 62 students and is led by Orientation Coordinator, Laurie Baio '93 and Orientation Intern, Eric Hodgson '94.

The Orientation program "helps first year students assimilate in a new setting and gives them an opportunity to meet people and get to know their way around campus," said Kari-Ann Kerr '93, Orientation Leader.

"If the students are involved in the activities they don't have time to be homesick," she added.

The Orientation Assistants "are trained to make the first five days as easy as possible for the freshman," said Allie Roby '94, Orientation Assistant.

"We build enthusiasm for activities and keep students informed of the orientation schedule," explained Katie DeBonville '95, Orientation Assistant.

"We also have had training dealing with situations first year students may encounter," she concluded, "such as alcohol or roomate problems."

with a broken hand, and McHugh looked very impressive with Bucknell's JV team but did not carry in varsity action.

WIDE RECEIVER: David "Whitey" Berardinelli '93 (5-9, 172) returns after an outstanding junior season in which he led Bucknell in receptions (46), receiving yards (769) and scoring (30 pts.). He became the first receiver to lead Bucknell in scoring since 1986, and capped the year by being named First-Team Academic All-America. He should again be the Bison's primary target this season.

The other wide receiver position will be contested between speedsters Damon Garner '94 (5-10, 160) and Brad Bernardini '94 (5-7, 150). Garner saw limited varsity duty last year, catching five passes for 74 yards, while Bernardini worked with the JV team. He also had an excellent year as a sprinter from Bucknell's track and field team.

Another potential starter is Troy White '95 (5-10, 160), who started at times at cornerback but switched to wide receiver in the spring.

TIGHT EN,D: Not only did Bucknell lose Pape, but it also lost his underrated backup, Tom Martin '92. That duo combined for 21 catches for 319 yards last year, and the tight end job is wide open as pre-season begins. Corey Zayatz '93 (6-3, 210) is the only returnee with any varsity experience, albeit limited. He caught two passes for 14 yards last year.

Andy Amrhein '94 (6-4, 210) made the move from quarterback to tight end this spring and finds himself in contention, as does Joe Zabielski '95 (6-3, 233) and Mark Gentile '95 (6-6, 208), who was also moved from the quarterback position. Steve Herbert '95 (6-4, 235), who lettered last year as a long-snapper and was a candidate at tight end, is likely to miss the entire season after suffering a torn anterior cruciate ligament this spring.

OFFENSIVE LINE:

The unit isanchored by Eric Rutter '93 (6-4, 273), who returns after earning second-team All-Patriot League honors last year. Other veterans in the interior include tackle Jeff Hart '93 (6-4, 280) and guards Craig Knuaer '93 (6-5, 255), Eric Green '93 (6-1, 253) and Vince Mays '94 (6-1, 260), who started most of last year at center.

Greg Gerdeman '95 (6-4,312) started most of last year at tackle, but is being challenged by Don Watson '94 (6-5,260). Watson also experimented at center this spring.

With Mays sliding over to guard this year, Ed Frattarelli '95 (6-3, 270) enter pre-season as the starting center, though he may be challenged by R.J. Maloney '93 (6-2, 230) and Gary Peatross '95 (6-1, 273).

DEFENSE

Bucknell's front four could rank among the finest in the Patriot League, with All-Patriot League defensive end John Lusk '93 returning to lead that group. The linebacker unit has lost all-league selection John Spatafore '92, who concluded his career second on Bucknell's all-time list with 363 tackles, and the secondary must continue to improve as it did late last year.

DEFENSIVE LINE: Lusk (6-5, 245) returns as the Bison's top lineman after making 59 tackles and team-high eight sacks last season. The other returning starter is defensive tackle Janne Kilpelainen '93 (6-5, 268), though he will be challenged by Shane Lympus '93 (6-2,280).

Defensive End Ted Malin '93 (6-4, 235) and tackle Cecil Boone '94 (6-3, 250) both improved markedly in the past year and are expected to be starters this season.

"In many ways, our defensive line keys our entire defense," says assistant coach Dan Meenan. "They must become dominant."

LINEBACKERS: Spatafore and John Toman '92 both started most of last year, leaving the Bison with two vacancies.

Two experienced middle linebackers return to compete for the starting job that both held at times last year. Kevin Kane '93 (6-1, 229) entered last season as the starter, but was hobbled all season by a recurring ankle injury. With Kane sidelined, Russ Strohecker '95 (6-2, 231) asserted himself last year, making 45 tackles. The other contenders for linebacker positions are Todd Hardy '94 (6-0, 218) and Dan Zappa '94 (5-11, 204), who saw occasional varsity action last year, and will likely enjoy an increased role this year.

SECONDARY: After using eight different starting combinations in 10 games last year, Marazana expects a more stable unit this year with several returning veterans.

The one constant throughout last season was Blain Fawcett '93 (6-2, 200), who started all 10 games last year and returns as a senior safety. He had 41 tackles and a pair of interceptions. The Bison also return Jeff Wall '93 (5-11, 193), Matt Noll '93 (6-0, 189) and Rob Fraass '93 (6-1, 196). All three saw considerable action last year. Wall (21 TK) started the year at fullback, then moved to cornerback in mid-season and started the final five games. He moved to safety in the spring, and is among the favorites to start. Noll started the final two games at corner, while Fraass played mainly in nickel and dime situations last year. Another safety that may work into the starting lineup is Todd Jessup '94 (6-0, 175), who sat out last year after transferring from Penn State but is coming off a strong spring. With Wall moving to safety, one cornerback spot is open and will be contested by Don Klingesmith '93 (5-9, 180) and Duane Hart '94 (5-11, 186).

SPECIAL TEAMS

Bucknell returns two kickers who struggled at times last year, and must find a replacement for Toman, the linebacker/punter who averaged 31.2 yards on a school-record 72 punts last year.

Justin Frick '94 (6-2, 190) started the year as the Bison's kicker, but made just one of five field goals and nine of 11 extra points He will be pushed, though, by walk-on Erik Hacker '94 who has had a good camp this fall. In the punting game, quarterback Kopp has showed his versatility and has been the most consistent candidate. He is competing with Jason Fralick '93 (6-1, 185), David Todd '95 (5-11, 180) and Zabielski, who is also competing for the tight end position. Todd averaged 31.5 yards per kick for the JV team last year, while Fralick was the varsity starter for nine games in 1990 before being beaten out by Toman.

Stop whining about white walls and decorate

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

You've arrived at school, gotten rid of your parents and are now standing in the middle of what is supposed to be your room. But it doesn't look like much; just this incredibly bland cubicle without so much as a hint of personality. So what to do? Well, if your college budget won't allow you to invite Nancy Reagan's personal decorator in to help you, there's only one answer—do it yourself.

For most first-year students, where to shop may be an even bigger question than what to buy. Not to worry, some useful items which you may not have thought to bring with you are readily availible within the Lewisburg area, and most of them within walking distance.

Answering machines,the lifeline of college students, may be purchased at Wal-Mart (Route 15 N.), Cole's Hardware Store (55 N. Second St.), and Ames (Route 15 N.,,). Wal-Mart offers the greatest variety of selections, with the lowest price starting at about $30.

Also, appliances such as refrigerators and microwaves are usually a must. The Bucknell physical plant rents new refrigerators to students for $110 per year and used models for $80. At the end of the year, students receive $70 back for the new models and $50 for the used models. Five-hundred watt microwaves are allowed in residence halls and may also be purchased at Wal-Mart.

If you'd like to brighten the room with some posters or prints, the BU bookstore usually holds an annual poster sale starting around the second or third week of September. But if you can't wait until then, perhaps a trip to the Susquehanna Valley Mall would be helpful.

In addition to posters, small flowers or plants, are a good way to lend color and warmth to an otherwise drab space. Dogwood Hill Florists, Martin's Florist and Stein's Florist are all located on Market Street. These stores sometimes even offer free plants to the first-year students.

Depending on your decorating tastes and abilities, you may find yourself in dire need of window decoration and you just aren't able to drape a sheet as creatively as the creative one across the hall. Ames and Wal-Mart stock several varieties of curtains, valances and mini-blinds, most priced under $20.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

With a little help from the shops of Lewisburg, you're room could soon looked as lived in and welcoming as this one.

Fans or portable window screens are a must for those of you who didn't manage to make it to air-conditioned bliss this year. Cole's Hardware, Ames and Wal-Mart all carry fans. Both Wal-Mart and Cole's stock portable window screens.

Did your residence hall shortchange you and leave you with cold tile floors? Well, before you start dreaming about sleeping on an ice-rink, take a look at remnants. Several places—Central Penn Carpet (Rt. 15 S., Winfield), Oberdorf's (439 N. Tenth St., Lewisburg), and the Rug Outlet (Brookpark Farms, Rt. 45, Lewisburg). The prices vary with the size and quality, so before you splurge and hit the limit on your Visa bill because you fell in love with a cream color deep-pile rug, remember that: 1. There will be hundreds of people in and out of your room over the next two semesters and 2. Chances are pretty great that you will spill a thing or two on the carpet between now and May. Would you really want to immortalize a spilled glass of iced tea forever?

There isn't very much real furniture to be found in the Lewisburg area which easily fits the college budget, but some common seating possibilities include beanbags and futons (Wal-Mart, Ames). Crates are also an essential part of room accessories. You can use them as footrests, bookshelves, stools, etc. The BU Bookstore has wooden crates for about $12 each as well as the plastic style for $14. Also, the Mercantile (Market St., Lewisburg) has a variety of sizes and colors at prices comparable to the bookstore's.

Finally, residents may choose to build lofts in order to increase their living space. Buffalo Lumber and Hardware Inc. (44 N. Tenth St.) and Lewisburg Builders Supply Co. (Rt. 15 and Hafer Rd.) can assist you with your loft construction. The Builders Supply can construct the lofts for you, with prices ranging between $45 and $100. Be aware, however, that the university only permits free-standing lofts. Students may not attach the loft to any part of the ceiling, walls or floorboards.

As you will soon see, there are many possibilities for your new place. Keep in mind that the space needs to be both functional and comfortable. But perhaps the most important aspect is your door. Even the most brilliantly designed room won't serve its purpose if the door is never open to welcome in the other new students.

$ Keep the cash flowing $

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Beverages, books, new carpet for the room, a tapestry for the wall, and another late night call for pizza. Hard-earned summer money is quickly spent at college. Obviously you need a pile of the green stuff. The question is ;"Where to keep it all?" Since stashing it under a mattress isn't exactly secure and out of state checks aren't always accepted in town, the only solution is to investigate the local banking options.

Six banking institutions conduct business out of the Lewisburg area. All offer the essential checking account and convenient MAC (Money Access Card) card. Each one charges a different price for its services, though, and offers different conveniences.

The bank and type of checking account that is least expensive for you depends upon the number of checks that will be used each month, the location where a MAC machine is most convenient to you (grocery store, in town by the movies and shops, or on campus), and whether or not you want to earn interest on your money and thus can maintain a minimum balance.

The deciding factor in choosing a bank just may be the cost of its MAC card transactions. While the Mifflinburg Bank and Trust Company only offers one of its own MAC machines (intersection of Market St. West and Fairgrounds Road), a ten dollar fee will allow the you to use any MAC machine on the East coast, including the one on campus, free of charge. West Milton Bank has a MAC machine located by Skips on Market St. West. It charges 75 cents for transactions at other bank's machines. Mellon Bank, located by McDonald's on Route 15 charges 75 cents per transaction also, while Northern Central Bank, with a machine on campus, by the movies and at the Susquehanna Valley Mall charges $1 per non-bank transactions. Commonwealth Bank, with machines at Weis Markets on Route 15 and on Third St., also assesses a $1 fee to non-Commonwealth machines transactions And for 30 cents Central Pennsylvania Savings Association will allow transactions at machines other than its own. Central Pennsylvania is headquartered along Route 15.

Checking account options are as varied as MAC machine prices. Each bank offers interest earning accounts. The minimum balance in this account varies from $100 at Central Pennsylvania Savings to $2500 at Mifflinburg Bank and Trust Company.

If you plan on only paying for your phonebill and a few other necessities a month by check, the Basic account at Mellon Bank is one of your options. It allows its customers four checks a month. Anymore cost 75 cents each. Commonwealth Bank has a similar plan—each check through them costs 50 cents. At Mifflinburg Bank and Trust Company, each check costs 35 cents. For those who like to sign their name on almost a daily basis, Northern Central Bank's 20 T account offers unlimited checking for a flat fee of $4 a month. And, Central Pennsylvania Savings Association offers 200 checks for only $12.18. The best bargain though, is at West Milton State Bank. Upon opening an account, you receive 50 free checks.

When applying for an account be sure to ask whether or not you will receive the cancelled copies of your checks back at the end of each month or just a statement from the bank. It is usually cheaper just to receive a statement. With a $100 minimum account, Central Pennsylvania Savings Association offers duplicate checks. Their checkbook comes with two copies of each check, so when you write one, the place of purchase will have a copy and so will you. This is helpful for those who never record their purchases. right away.

Whichever bank you choose to suit your cashflow needs, just remember—balance your checkbook. Bounced checks costs extra money. And MAC machines often often spit out money even if there is none in your account. Some banks make you pay it back; others don't.

As Bucknell welcomes its sesquicentennail class, it both opens and closes its door of history. With the Class of 1996, the University will celebrate and mark its achievements over the past 150 years. This incoming group of first-year students both has standards to uphold and to carry forth and traditions to end.

These 477 men and 439 women will continue Bucknell's commitment to an equal education. The school was created as a co-ed institution and has long (way before its time) respected the minds of both the male and the female. As the Class of 1996 matriculates, it will make a promise to Bucknell to strive for continued equality and respect of the sexes. Both men and women's voices will be heard in classes of all types, from chemical engineering to women's studies. With the help of such student initiated groups as Men Against Rape and Feminist Outreach, everyone will be made to feel safe on campus, and understood.

New courses will be introduced over the next four years, keeping with the University's promise of advancement. Students will be exposed to technological advances and cultures as well as ways of thinking from around the world. Because of their time at Bucknell, myths will be dispelled and the affect of others' opinions will be felt.

Four years from now the Class of 1996 will also be asked to assume the role of dedicated alumni. It has been through the help of generous graduates that Bucknell is the institution of higher learning that it now is. Alumni such as Robert Rooke, Sigmuend Weis, Ken Langone, and Daniel Roberts gave generously to Bucknell because of all they received from the University. It was the education and experiences they received while on campus that made them the successes that they, and thousands of other alumni, are today.

For many Bucknell alumni, some of their happiest memories are of college. Days of lounging on the lawn of the academic quad, laughing with friends while merrily strolling Seventh Street or fraternity row, making a new discovery of the world or of oneself while doing research, and meeting people that will remain lifelong friends, easily come to mind when reminiscing about Bucknell. These are the memories that will live vividly in the minds of Bucknell graduates and stay with them forever.

So as the 150th graduating class of Bucknell begins to take on the traditions of classes past, let's all remember why we are here. Enjoy your classes and the time spent away from them. Plan now for an unforgettable last Jan-Plan with your Bucknell buddies. Make a difference with the knowlegde that you gather over your four years. Know what it means to be a real Bucknellian and continue the success of those who have wandered this campus before you.

When you made the transition from high school to college, what do you wish you'd known about living and learning at Bucknell? Is there anything you would have done differently?

"I wish knew that I was not going to be able to cram the night before my exams and get a great grade like I could in high school. I would have spent more time on my studies instead of spending a lot of my time socializing"

PHIL BRIGOULEIX '95

"I wish I had known more about all the extracurricular activities and clubs around campus. There are so many organizations and opportunities at Bucknell it would be a waste of my college years not to take advantage of them."

SARA NOBLE '95

"I would not have gotten so worried about meeting new people. No one knows anyone at first, but after a few days you won't be able to remember evryone's name. If you have problems you could always talk to an RA or professor."

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

So you think there's nothing to do here?

"Where are you going to school next year?"
"Bucknell University."
"Isn't that somewhere in Pennsylvania?"
"Right in the center."
"What are you going to do on the weekends? Go cow-tipping?"
"I guess so."

Sound familiar? This all-too-repeated conversation is one of the major fallbacks of a school surrounded by farmland and cattle. Who hasn't questioned their choice of schools as they scan their options for a Friday night? In a town where everything closes by dinnertime and the prospect of having to shop for groceries means consulting the list of people you know with cars, it's easy to miss the host of activities available. ...Even in a town with only one bar.

Welcome to Bucknell, located in historic old Lewisburg. Within the four years you're here, the campus will become your home, Bucky the Bison your lovable mascot, and the community a fun filled environment you never knew could exist in the middle of Pennsylvania.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The nearest city is hours away by car. Open your window on a warm spring day and the smell of fresh cow manure wafts across campus. You can't even get a decent TV station without a mighty strong antenna or a cable hook up. Uh, oh. We're not in Kansas anymore, Toto. Welcome to Bucknell. Your home away from home.

Relax. Just because Lewisburg is not the cultural center of America, doesn't mean it lacks in culture. All you need to do is scan the weekly Arts and Entertainment calendar of events to realize there's more to campus life than watching CNN in the Bison.

For starters, movie buffs should have a field day with the amount of free flicks the school offers throughout the year. The Hilltop Film Series brings film classics to the Vaughan Lit Auditorium every Friday at 4:30 and 8 p.m. These less known, less commercial films give students the chance to watch movies that represent the highlights and achievments of film history.

The Bucknell Activities Council (BAC) also sponsors a film series of more contemporary movies. Shown Tuesdays and Thursdays at 8 p.m., these films are broadcast on Channel 41. And for that simulated movie theater atmosphere, BAC features Saturday night movies starting at 10:30 p.m. in the Vaughan Lit Auditorium. Last year's line-up included such recent hits as Theatre and Dance premieres several events throughout the semester. With a company that is fueled by the enthusiasm of the students and the energy of the staff, the Bucknell Dance Company offers two performances a year that are a must-see. Combined with the five or six theatrical productions, the department provides an occasional night out for dinner and a show. And just across the campus is Central Pennsylvania's cultural center, the Weis Center for Performing Arts. A modern facility, the Weis Center sponsors several outside guest artists a year and top level concerts. Some of last year's performers included jazz musician Branford Marsalis and folk singer Holly Near, and this year's calendar promises more high quality entertainment.

Some of you may still be unconvinced. Did you know that Bucknell has its own art museum on campus? Located on the third floor of the Langone Center, the Center Gallery brings frequent exhibits in all ranges of artistic fields and interests. In addition, the Gallery houses a permanent collection with examples from every "Art in the Dark" course. This year will begin with a Native American Exhibit to be opened tomorrow. Admission is free and the small studio gallery provides a haven for browsers and thinkers to spend an afternoon.

You want more? You want concerts, music, a place to just hang out and grab a cup of coffee? The Bison is the place for you. An area for more relaxed forms of entertainment, the Bison acts as a stage in a club-like atmosphere. Student performed coffeehouses, concerts,

"What is arts and entertainment?" Let's first break this question down to "what is art?" and "what is entertainment?".

Entertainment differs for each person. The athletic person is usually highly entertained by watching and playing sports. Others use books or theater as an intellectual rollercoaster of fun. For the back to basics, a day of watching grass grow and dreaming in the sun brings fulfillment and relaxing entertainment. The creative person may enjoy writing or painting in their free time. And the vegetables, commonly known as couch potatoes, find heaven in front of a widescreen television set.

The word art immediately brings an array of separate meanings. If you have ever had an "Intro to Art" course, the Impressionists and Surrealists probably first come to mind. Others may envision great marble sculptures or stolen "generations." Whether you consider art as coming from the brush, chisel, or camera, their common bond is the captivity of a piece of life.

What this section hopes to bring to its readers is a wealth of information as varied as the interpretations of the words arts and entertainment. It can't give you a television set but it can make sure that you know all of the hottest videos. to view on your own. There will be book reviews to help you pick out light reading as well as music, theater, and art reviews to help you enjoy your time away from the classroom.

College is supposed to be a time of experimentation and broadening. If not anything else, the Arts and Entertainment section will give you a broad amount of entertaining things to experiment with.

Jazz musician Branford Marsalis was only one of the featured performers last year in the Weis Center. Visiting artists to the Center ranged from local theater groups to international acrobats.

Commentary

Don't Believe the Hype

Approximately four months ago, and a scant three days after being appointed as one of this semester's sports editors, my editor-in-chief and I were brainstorming for article ideas for this year's orientation issue. Eventually, the suggestion of interviewing Bucknell's coaches about their upcoming seasons was raised, and a confused smile crossed my face.

"Why?" I asked slowly, with as much authority as I, with my half-week of experience, could muster. My question needed explaining, and so I did some fast talking.

It is a given that, contrary to what bored and idle sports writers would like to believe during the off-season of every year, athletic coaches will usually have very little to say of substance about their teams' prospects. Simply put, no coaches worth their weight in paprika want to give the opposition (or anyone else, for that matter) the jump on their squads by revealing the true nature of their skill level or what kind of shot at a championship they have. Anyone who has witnessed an interview with an NHL head coach after a pre-season hockey game knows as much. More meaningful exchanges can be seen at the Middle East peace talks.

Now, don't get me wrong, here. Coaches have every reason not to give up all of their secrets so soon and so easily, and this should be understood by the average fan. But what kills me are the verbal contortions that coaches often go through to redirect attention away from their players so as to lessen scrutiny upon them. How often have you heard these?

"Fordham's the team to beat this year... We'll be chasing them all season."

"If we finish around .500, I'll be satisfied with this campaign."

"We gotta lot of young kids this time around... It'll definitely be an uphill battle for us."

"Get out of my office! Get out! We're gonna be awful this season!"

Most of these should ring a bell.

There is a certain skill involved in this posturing, however, and not everyone can do it correctly. Not many sports fans are aware of this, but Jerry Tarkanian, the former head coach of UNLV's Runnin' Rebels basketball team, was not forced to step down because of allegations of scandal within his hardwood program in Nevada. He was, in fact, brushed off into semi-retirement because he had extreme difficulty keeping from every major metropolitan newspaper in North, Central, and South America that his cagers crew was going to go to town all over the rest of the NCAA and win the national championship in 1990. The Shark never was one to bother with a poker face regarding how good his team was, and the man paid the ultimate price for it...at least until the San Antonio Spurs snatched him up.

A case at the opposite end of this spectrum, though, can be found in Joe Gibbs, coach of the Washington Redskins. After a pre-season loss to the New York Jets in 1991, Gibbs was asked by a local reporter what he thought of his team's shot at the Super Bowl for the upcoming season. Frustrated by the defeat, the coach launched into a tirade about how no franchise should even be daydreaming about a world championship after such a poor display on the field, and berated the reporter for even posing the question at all.

Needless to say, the Redskins went on last season to handily defeat the Buffalo Bills in the Super Bowl. As a footnote, it should be said that Gibbs later apologized to the press for his outburst.

The point to all of this, of course, is that one can rarely predict what kind of season a team is going to have from the coach's remarks alone. A good field general will always keep the public guessing, and the athletic program heads here at Bucknell hold few exceptions.

So how does one figure out the big picture? Simple. Just go to the games, support our athletes, good or bad, and decide for yourself.

Bison gridiron preview for '92

The football team's offensive and defensive lines are key to resurgence; starting QB still undecided

BO SMOLKA
Bucknellian Staff Alumnus

What a difference a year makes.

After guiding Bucknell through one of its finest seasons in recent history in 1990 (7-4), Bison head coach Lou Marazana last year endured one of the more trying campaigns of his career, winning just once in ten tries.

But this is a new year, and Marazana is expecting a similarly dramatic reversal of fortunes that should propel the Bison back into Patroit League contention.

Whereas last year Bucknell opened the season with no offensive linemen that had ever started a game, this year the Bison open with six linemen that have started at least six games.

Whereas last year Bucknell opened the season with no returning starters at wide receiver, this year the Bison open with a returning First Team Academic All-American coming off one of the finest seasons ever for a Bison receiver.

And whereas last year six freshman were pressed into starting action — a testament to team deficiencies more than 30 lettermen, including two all-league players and 14 other starters, return to give the Bison a much more veteran unit.

That's not to say Marazana doesn't have some major concerns as he prepares for his fourth season in charge of the Bison program.

For the second straight year, Bucknell enters pre-season practice with no definitive starting quarterback, with an unstable secondary, and with a questionable kicking game.

The ability to solve those problems, and the continued development of the offensive line, will greatly determine just how much difference one year makes for Bucknell.

OFFENSE

While eight starters return, two that don't — tailback Brian Henesey '92 and tight end Jeff Pape '92 — present gaping holes to fill. Henesey became the first player in history to lead the Bison in rushing for four straight years, and concluded his career as Bucknell's all-time leading rusher with 2,649 yards. Although Pape's numbers were down last year (14 catches for 191 yards), he earned First-Team All-Patriot League honors for the second straight year.

QUARTERBACK: There are two contenders, and not a senior in sight.

Bucknell's youth last year was no more evident that at quarterback, where two different freshman saw starting action. Travis Kopp '95 (6-2, 208) started the final five games last year and completed 59 of 131 passes for 834 yards, a Bucknell freshman record. In his first career start, Kopp threw for 304 yards against Lafayette, the sixth best single-game total in Bucknell history.

Kopp, though, missed spring drills after undergoing surgery on his right shoulder in the off-season. He is, however, expected to return to compete for the starting job in pre-season. With Kopp sidelined, Rob Glus '95 (6-2, 177) emerged from spring practice as the top challenger fro the starting assignment. Glus, who started the Cornell game last year, appeared in five other games and completed 18 of 47 passes for 200 yards. He did not throw a touchdown and was intercepted five times.

RUNNING BACK: With Henesey gone, Matt Walsh '93 (5-11, 195) is the a heir apparent at tailback. Henesey's primary understudy for most of the past three years and Bucknell's top all-purpose back, Walsh carried 20 times for 53 yards last year before moving to wide receiver early in the season. He carried for 370 yards and three touchdowns as a sophomore. Walsh will also serve as the Bison's punt returner again this year after averaging 7.7 yards on 20 returns last season.

Tailback Matt Walsh '93 will help lead the Bison during the '92 campaign. He will be showcasing his talents tomorrow during the intersquad scrimmage which begins at 1:30 p.m. at Christy Matthewson Memorial Stadium.

Joe Vargo '93 (6-0, 182) and Kevin McElvene '93 (5-10, 210) will also compete for time at tailback after seeing occasional action last year. Vargo, who switched to fullback midway through last season, carried 32 times for 125 yards, while McElvene gained 97 yards on 28 carries.

At fullback, Ron Mesaros '92 has graduated after starting most of last season, and the top contenders include Charron Anderson '93 (5-8, 200) and Steve McHugh '95 (6-0, 240). Anderson missed all last season

Boys of Summer find true glory

Bucknellians coach area little leaguers during break and receive rewarding experience from their Orioles

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writers

It's the dream of nearly every father: to coach his son or daughter's little league team to a championship. While most dads have to wait until their twentieth reunions to tell the dramatic story, Chris Drowne '93 and Jon Terry '93 had the opportunity to get a twenty year head start.

This past summer they juggled household budgets, jobs, and vacation plans to remain on campus to coach a regular season team as well as the town's Senior League All-Star team (ages 14-15). Without a doubt, they said, it was the most rewarding summer of their lives as their regular season team captured its first ever league title and the All-Stars won the area championship for the first time in Lewisburg senior history.

What had been conceived in the spring of their sophomore year as a two-year project fell into place in late June when their Lewisburg West Milton State Bank Orioles (try fitting that on the front of a 14-year old's jersey) team won the Twin Counties Senior League Championship with a 15-2 record. Traveling to the various towns that made up this 19-team league became almost as exciting as some of the games, they said. Parents asking them for directions to the Milmont Blue Jays home field usually turned into a joke. How was someone from New York or someone from Maryland going to know? The directions they got from other coaches all sounded the same; make a right past the big farm and you can't miss it. Right.

Everybody always has a most memorable game, but not one of them can top their victory over the Milton Blue Jays, they said, who had beaten them 17-3 last season and were stacked again this year. Their leadoff batter was 6'1", 180 lbs. of muscle. Chris and Jon's pitcher was a 5'1", 88 lbs. rookie with a 40 mph fastball. The guy drooled as he watched the warm-up pitches barely reach otheir ur catcher's mitt, they recalled. Three pitches later he had struck out. On his way back to the dugout, he stopped and stared at our pitcher who just smiled and winked back at him. They went on to pound the team that had embarrassed them the season before, 22-3.

They didn't know it at the time, but paybacks would be the theme of the All-Star season as well. Seven teams comprised Pennsylvania's District 13 - Area 2 double elimination tournament. Defeats by more than 20 runs the year before had made optimism all but impossible entering the tournament. Northumberland, one of the towns that had no problem (or conscience) running up the score last year would be the target of of their first payback, a 5-3 win that set up a meeting with arch-rival Mifflinburg.

After having the game postponed a day because one of the umpires was locked in at the prison (don't ask me to explain, they still aren't certain), Mifflinburg popped their bubbles and sent them to the loser's bracket, 9-1. Northumberland had knocked off a couple of other teams to earn the right to play them again. Eager to erase doubts that people began to have after the Mifflinburg loss, Chris and Jon's team stompted "Norry" 9-3.

Now it was time for the ultimate payback, a chance to defeat Mifflinburg for the area championship, something that they expected to walk away with when the tournament started. However, since their opponents had yet to lose, they had to defeat them twice. Still not given much of a chance by even their own fans, they stunned Mifflinburg (and Lewisburg) by lighting up the hero of their opponents previous championships for ten runs. Now it was one game for the title.

What seemed like the whole town showed up for the championship game at the field next to the farmers' market and East Buffalo Township Police building. The game was no longer 14 teenagers against 14 teenagers; it had turned into Lewisburg against Mifflinburg. A couple of "city boys," as most of the fans referred to the coaches, couldn't appreciate this.

Mifflinburg appeared surprised and flustered by the confidence of their players. They had paid back everybody else who had soundly defeated them , now it was time to repay the team from further up Route 45. From the first pitch to the final out we they in control. The Area Championship that nobody had even dared to dream about was now theirs with the 6-3 victory.

The town went nuts. Newspaper coverage was tremendous. People the coaches had never seen before were wishing them luck in the next round. Any lingering regrets about altering their initial summer plans in favor of coaching were completely erased.

Next up was Berwick (see USA Today's High School Football Top 20) for the District Championship. Due to a format which nobody seems to agree with, they had to defeat them twice for the district title before they beat the Lewisburg squad just once. The two coaches would've been the smallest guys on their team and they're both six years older than all of them. Needless to say, the players were intimidated by their size and by the championship pennants that hung from the flagpole next to a field where they hadn't been beaten in what one elderly fan said "as long as I can remember."

Trailing 2-1 (on solo home runs by their number eight and leadoff men) going into the top of the last inning, everybody finally realized that this could be it. The "win the area title and whatever follows is gravy" attitude that many had was gone. They weren't ready for "normal" summers just yet. Movie writers should have had their pencils and pads ready for what followed. The Lewisburg team hit back-to-back homers to lead off the inning and held on for the 3-2 victory. It was an indescribable feeling to watch the players and town continue to ride the high that all of them had been on since the beginning of the spring, the coaches said .

The worst aspect of tournament play is that every team but one ends its season with a loss. Berwick's 6'4" 195 lbs ace struck out ten on his way to throwing a one-hit, 4-0 shutout. The next mornings headlines read "Cindarella season come to end for Lewisburg Seniors." Instead of sustaining the high that they had just two days ago, they watched another town drive away with it and a district championship flag.

However, the respect and attention that the town had given the team still remained. "The Casa" man says hello and congratulations every time they walk in for dinner. The coaches had several open invitations from parents to go over for dinner, lunch, or to even swim whenever they wanted. It was invitations like those that helped make it all worth while, they said.

Chris and Jon both know that this experience still doesn't quite compare to a father's dream, but it was a summer the two of them will treasure.

Cause of TKE fire remains undetermined

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Fire broke out at TKE Friday afternoon causing approximately $30,000 of damage and destroying two rooms of the house. Four fire companies responded to and controlled the blaze.

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After nearly three intense hours of investigation, the official cause of last Friday's fire at the Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity house was cited by the Fire Marshal on Tuesday to be of "undetermined origin," according to Bucknell Safety Manager Jim McCormick.

McCormick would not speculate on the cause of the fire but said that the Fire Marshal has ruled out the possibility of electrical malfunction.

"The Fire Marshal set the room back up again and was able to determine the location where the fire started in the corner section of a room," said McCormick. "However, he does not know the ignition source."

According to Associate Dean for Residential Life Edward Dadez, the TKE house had recently undergone electrical renovations to avoid any fire hazards from faulty wiring.

"Just two years ago the Alumni House Corporation rewired the house at a cost of $30,000," said Dadez.

The fire, which began in the room of Mike Scherer '94, Will Funk '94, and Jeff Gilbert '94, was discovered by several TKE brothers after a fire alarm alerted them to the problem.

"We heard the alarm and went to check out what was going on," said TKE President Dan Hauck. "Then we smelled the smoke."

Ten of the 29 brothers who live in the building were in the house at the time of the fire.

According to Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio, the Department of Public Safety discovered the fire when the alarm came into the Public Safety dispatch at 4:03 p.m. Public Safety officers arrived on the scene one minute later.

The fire was confirmed at 4:06 p.m. and the first unit of the fire company arrived at 4:09 p.m.

A total of four fire companies responded to the blaze which completely gutted two adjoining rooms.

"The fire was contained within those rooms," said McCormick. "There was no structural damage and the other rooms that were affected are still livable."

The total damage to the building and its contents was estimated by Fire Chief Barry Catherman on Friday afternoon to be approximately $30,000. According to Dadez, responsibility for cleanup and rebuilding of the alumni-owned house will fall on the Alumni House Corporation.

Two people suffered minor injuries from smoke inhalation. The victims, Scott Gerhardt, a TKE brother, and Michelle Korbar, the first officer to enter the house, were taken to Evangelical Hospital where they were held for observation for

Campus renovations near completion

Twenty-four hour study lounge and computer room moved inside main library

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell students were welcomed back to campus last week by new looks on some old buildings. Davis Gym and Trax residence hall headed the list of structures that underwent significant renovations over the summer.

In 1990, a committee was assigned to review the Instructional Media Services division of the University. The committee's report recommended that the division should increase their visibility and access to faculty and student body so that their services could be integrated into instruction. Acting on this recommendation in hopes that increased availability of the services would encourage more people to use them, Instructional Media Services relocated into the former 24-hour section of the Library.

The end result of this move, according to Ann de Klerk, Director of Library Services, will be that services of the Library and Instructional Media Services are delivered more conveniently and expediently than before. Having both branches of the division in the same building will also make information more accessible and convenient for instructional purposes, she added.

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Residents of Trax Hall returned to find some work unfinished. Bathroom renovations should be completed by month's end.

Although Library staff is still "fine-tuning" the changes that have been made, services have been running smoothly. An Open House is being planned for the public once Instructional Media Services has completely settled in their new surroundings.

The 24-hour section has moved inside the main Library on the main floor, closest to the Delta Upsilon fraternity. The new location offers the same number of computer terminals and study spaces, but has incorporated them into the same room. The only difference created by this shift is that there is no longer a vending lounge dedicated solely to eating and drinking.

The major benefit of this relocation is that students will have access to materials, especially those on Reserve, as they are studying or using the terminals. Students in the 24-hour section will be asked, twenty minutes before the main library closes, to leave the study area, check out or return their materials for the night at the Circulation desk, and re-enter the after-hours study area through a side door located on the Delta Upsilon side of the building.

Students using terminals or study carrels are assured that they will have their space reserved for them until their return. Students can enter the after hours study section from the side door any time after the main library has closed.

In addition to the Library renovations, the Board approved a series of refurbishing procedures at the Trustees meeting last May which included those to Davis Gym and Trax Hall. According to Barry Maxwell, vice-president for administration, the cost of the Davis Gym project, which includes expanding the seating area, was not to exceed $225,000. The cost of Trax renovations, which includes new bathrooms, was not to exceed $430,000.

Although library staff is still "fine-tuning" the changes that have been made, services have been running smoothly.

According to Gerry Commerford, assistant dean for housing, the renovations that took place over the summer were part of a long-range plan that will help maintain the appearance of the campus. The administration, with the help of the Physical Plant, take an annual inventory of all campus facilities to see what work is needed. A priority list is then generated and a decision made as to what can be done with the financial resources available.

Trax Hall took top priority on the list for this summer. Starting in the first week of June, the Physical Plant crew completed major renovations, including the refurbishing of all rooms; the rooms, halls, and stairtower were painted; five new rooms were added to the fifth floor; and all windows were caulked, sealed and refurbished. New bathrooms are also being added to each floor which made co-ed living arrangements possible. The bathroom project is expected to be completed by the end of the month.

The heating system in Trax was also a priority, but when the Physical Plant put the project up to bid, the bid they received was much higher than anticipated. Instead of renovating the entire heating system, the Physical Plant is experimenting with a temporary heating system on the fourth floor. If that system works as planned, it will eventually be extended to the rest of the building.

Commerford noted, however, that heating should be better because the windows have been refurbished, thereby improving insulation.

Other residence halls that underwent renovations include some parts of Bucknell West, which received new paneling and siding; Hulley House, where student rooms were repainted and the outside was stripped and repainted; and Carey House, where the bathrooms and public areas were renovated.

Several non-residence buildings were also included in the renovation project. Davis Gym, according to Maxwell, will be improved aesthetically by redesigning and repainting the its floor and expanding the seating area by 200 seats. Instead of the long, continuous benches in the upper seating level, the bleachers will now have seating pads placed approximately every 18 inches. This will prevent the fans from uncomfortably "scrunching" together. Rick Hartzell, Athletic Director, said that the upper level now has seating for 1434 fans.

The project also includes 440

Kosak named V.P. University Relations

BY DENISE MAUTONE

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Kosak comes to Bucknell with extensive fundraising experience.

Following a lengthy and involved search, Robbee Baker Kosak has been appointed to the position of Vice-President of University Relations.

Replacing former vice-president Richard Carter, Kosak was chosen out of a host of highly qualified candidates. According to President Gary Sojka, "It was quite an overwhelming slate of appealing candidates from various areas across the country."

As vice-president of University Relations Kosak will be in the process of rebuilding the staff of University Relations in preparation for the university's next major fundraiser.

Kosak leaves an impressive resume behind her. Previous experience includes her work in private foundations for fundraising at Carnegie Mellon University and a promotion to Assistant Vice-President of Development at Northwestern University. Most recently, she was in charge of a $125 million campaign for fundraising at the Illinois Institute of Technology. "Add up all these place," said Gary Sojka, "and you're faced with a very good set of credentials."

Kosak is continually working with Alumni Relations to gather funding for various projects, including financial aid, curricular renewal, the engineering fund, the Bison club, technical equipment, and endless others. She stresses the importance that Alumni place in supporting financial aid and creating scholarships.

Bucknell mourns loss of two students

Bucknell University has suffered the loss of two of its students whose deaths came at the hands of separate tragic accidents over the summer months.

Jeannine C. Liutkus, Class of 1993, died June 24 as the result of a horseback riding accident. Liutkus had studied the previous semester in France and had stayed on there to live and work for the summer with a French-American family. A memorial service was held on Sunday, September 6.

The University has established the Jeannine C. Liutkus Prize in her memory.

The prize will be awarded annually at Convocation to the student who has studied in France and has benefited most from the experience.

Stephanie Ann Sayre, class of 1991, died August 15 in New Jersey as the result of injuries she sustained in an automobile accident on August 1. Sayre received a master's degree in corporate psychology.

Because of Sayre's great love of the University, her parents requested she be buried in the Lewisburg cemetery. A memorial service was held on Monday, August 24.

Phone system changed

BY SAMANTHA SHIVERS AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The University Telephone Office has recently instituted a digital billing system that will attempt to decrease unnecessary charges.

According to Melanie Aumon, telecommunications assistant, the analog system which was previously used was ineffective because it failed to detect whether or not the receiving party answered the call. In addition, calls that had been disconnected were often billed as if the parties had never hung up.

"One fellow fell asleep on the phone," said Telecommunications Supervisor Dan Malick. "The other line was hung up but he was still billed for the entire night."

Fortunately the new system eliminates such problems. Not only is each connection detected, but the clarity of the call itself is improved.

However, the new system is not without its drawbacks. The digital system is considerably more costly than its analog counterpart.

According to Malick, however, such drawbacks are outweighed by the system's benefits. "Digital systems are more expensive," he said, "but the savings will edge out the initial cost later on."

Sophomore rush in progress

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The first full-scale sophomore rush is currently underway with 330 men and 315 women participating.

This represents a decrease from the 385 men and 365 women who rushed in the Spring of 1991. "We are optimistic that sophomore rush is going to be a success," said Edward Dadez, I.F.C. Advisor and Associate Dean for Residential Life. "The numbers are slightly down but we believe the students going through the process are more committed and we are not expecting such a large drop out as has occurred in the past."

Both Panhel and Interfraternity Council anticipate that sophomore rush will be successful despite some minor inconveniences occurring as a result of conflicting campus activities. According to Eva Szreniawski, Panhel President, "Rush is running smoothly. However, there are a lot of scheduling problems because of sports practices this time of the year." Despite such kinks in the system, the general consensus about the new program is positive. "I don't think we will be hurt by sophomore rush," said Peter Brady '93, IFC president. "I think the fraternities will continue to prosper."

"It is too soon to say if other possible problems are going to materialize," said Ruth Burnham, Panhel Advisor and Associate Dean for Orientation and Activities

The change from freshman rush held in the spring semester to the current system of sophomore rush in the fall semester came about as a result of a recommendation made by the Trustees in the spring of 1991.

It has not yet been determined whether Rush will continue to be held in the fall semester in future years. "We will have to look back to see if rush was successful and then possibly look into moving it," said Dadez.

One method through which the effectiveness of sophomore rush will be determined is a report which will be issued by the newly formed Trustee Implementation Planning progress committee co-chaired by Nancy Weyant, Reference Librarian and Trevor Wilson '93.

The committee will review the progress of changes mandated by the Trustees which address many aspects of the University including Greek life, Residential life, and social changes. "The trustees issued a set of principles that they saw as being fundamental to life at Bucknell and out of these grew a cluster of directives in an attempt to improve life on campus," said Nancy Weyant, Co-Chair.

The committee will "see what position the University is at now in relation to the directives which have been made," said Wilson.

"I don't think the trustees will change back to freshman rush on the basis of one year's experience," said Burnham. "The evaluating committee will look at what goes well and what doesn't and make recommendations for change."

Sophomore and junior women gather in Hunt hall stairwell as they anxiously await the start of the next rush party.

However, University Relations' role is not in the selection of the actual projects. President Sojka and residing chairpersons are given lists of needs from students, faculty, administration, and alumni. From this list, the needs are attended to according to priority.

University Relations advises whether the selected projects are marketable and whether they are interesting enough to attract funding.

When asked what attracted her to Bucknell, Kosak cited the well-roundedness of a Bucknell education "Bucknell encompasses what I personally feel strongest about, which is the ability to combine a liberal arts education with engineering and the sciences."

The new vice president of University Relations was impressed by the quality of Bucknell, the academics offered, and the supportive Alumni body.

Another facet of Bucknell that appealed to Kosak was the quality of student/faculty relationships. "Other universities say that they have great relationships between students and faculty, but they are only words," she added. "At Bucknell, it is a reality."

Kosak compared these relationships between students and faculty to a circle. "The students and faculty comprise the inner part of the circle, while the chair persons, trustees, and administration stand on the outside," she elaborated.

"It is what the students and faculty create as entities that make any efforts produced by University Relations worthwhile."

According to Kosak, Bucknell is very lucky because it places activity where there is publicity. "It is action oriented," she stresses, "and has the advantage of size, a stable financial status, and a university community that is welcome to change."

Kosak plans to work closely with the student body. "I think the students are the most persuasive spokespeople the University has," she said. "They are currently living what Bucknell is today."

She also added that students are valuable information sources that the university must tap into in order to bring about any necessary changes. Kosak encourages students to voice their opinions.

According to Vice President of Academic Affairs Larry Shinn, "Kosak is sincerely interested in educational issues."

Through his involvement in her selection, Mr. Shinn is convinced that the addition of Kosak to Bucknell "is a fortuitous opportunity at this juncture in Bucknell's history."

One of the reasons for Kosak's interest in Bucknell as a whole is her own liberal arts education. A graduate of Penn State University, Kosak's liberal arts education was influential in shaping her present attitudes.

"My liberal arts education enabled me to think critically, achieve balance, and be more flexible in my career," she said.

With all her responsibilities, Kosak confides, "I couldn't do it all, if I really didn't love it! President Gary Sojka anticipates that Kosak will have a substantial impact on Bucknell.

"We hope," the president stated, "that under her leadership, University Relations will be more effectively incorporated into the life of our university."

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Tuesday, September 1

Officers responded at 2:55a.m. for a fire alarm activation at Tau Kappa Epsilon. Upon arrival a TKE brother stated that he and a few others set fire to a pile of paper on the kitchen floor, just to see what would happen. The fire alarm system then activated and the small fire was put out with an extinguisher by one of the brothers. No damage was done to the kitchen floor.

An employee of Bertrand Library reported the theft of a Rom Silver Disc from the reference section of the library. The disc was taken on Wednesday, August 19. Approximate value of the disk is $750.00.

A custodial supervisor in the downhill area reported the theft of various pieces of furniture from Larison and Harris residence halls. On Friday, September 4, a Residential Life staff member discovered two of the missing peices in two different student rooms. The furniture was returned to the proper location(s). Some furniture is still missing at this time.

Wednesday, September 2

A resident of Swartz Hall reported at 3 a.m. that someone had broken a window pane in her residence room with a golf ball. Physical Plant was contacted to repair the damaged pane. No description of the perpetrator was available.

A student reported the theft of his wallet from the main floor of the Fieldhouse. The wallet was taken sometime between 7:30 and 8:30 p.m. on Wednesday, September 2. Student stated that his wallet and his clothes were left unattended when the theft occurred.

Thursday, September 3

A Public Safety Officer discovered at 7:30 a.m., that unknown person(s) did throw a wine bottle at and shattered a window of the Observatory. Custodial personnel cleaned up the broken glass and the Physical Plant was contacted to replace the window.

A student reported to Public Safety that between 11:30 p.m., September 2 and 10:15 a.m., September 3, unknown person(s) did cut the vinyl top of his vehicle while it was parked in Swartz Lot. The perpetrator(s) then removed two speakers valued at $200.00. The vehicle was locked at time of entry.

A resident of the Gateways reported the theft of his drivers license from his unlocked residence room. The driver's license was taken sometime between 9 p.m. on Tuesday, September 1 and 4 a.m. Wednesday, September 2. Other valuables in the room were left untouched.

A resident of Vedder Hall reported to officers that she had been the victim of harassing phone calls. Resident was advised of the harassing phone call procedure and was advised to contact the Public Safety office should the calls persist.

Friday, September 4

Public Safety Officers responded to a fire alarm activation at Tau Kappa Epsilon at 4:04 p.m. Flames were visible upon their arrival, and the fire department was immediately requested to respond. The fire was contained to the east wing of the first floor. However smoke and water damage permeated the structure. One resident and a Public Safety officer were treated for minor injuries and released from the Evangelical Emergency Room.

Saturday, September 5

Officers responded to first Vedder, east wing at 2:15 a.m. for a fire alarm activation. Officers found that unknown person(s) did activate a pull station for no apparent purpose. The station and alarm system were reset.

At 2:05 a.m., officers observed an individual enter a vehicle parked in the TKE parking lot. The perpetrator then fled on foot into the field behind TKE, where he was apprehended by an officer approximately 200 yards behind the house. He was identified as a visitor to campus who was staying at another fraternity house. East Buffalo police department responded to the call and cited the individual for defiant trespassing and underage drinking.

Public Safety officers responded to the Langone Center for a reported hand laceration at 6:30 a.m. A Dining Service employee was treated at the scene, and was transported by a Dining Service supervisor to Evangelical Community Hospital for further evaluation.

Saturday, September 6

Officers responded to a fire alarm activation at 12:26 a.m. at Kappa Sigma Fraternity. Unknown person(s) did discharge a fire extinguisher on the third floor hallway for no apparent reason. The fire extinguisher was replaced and the alarm system was reset after the chemicals from the extinguisher were cleared from the hall.

Sunday, September 7

Officers responded at 9:29 p.m. to Vedder Hall on a report of a student suffering from an allergic reaction. On arrival officers found that the allergic reation had ceased, and the individual declined any further assistance and/or medical treatment.

Monday, September 8

A resident of Roberts Hall reported that unknown person(s) did throw a tomato at her room window, on at 12:37 a.m., thus breaking a window pane. Physical Plant was notified to make repairs.

Officers responded to the Langone Center at 7:50 p.m. for a student who had sustained an ankle injury. The student was transported to Student Health Services and treated by the Duty Nurse.

Overcrowding occurs in housing facilities

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The restructuring of rooms in Smith and Vedder, as well as some rooms in the A and B wings of Swartz, has received mixed responses from students affected by the changes.

All 10 of the lounges in Smith have been converted into triples, and the five lounges in Vedder have been changed to doubles, according to Gerry Commerford, Associate Dean for Housing. He added that 100 single rooms in Swartz were converted into doubles.

The lounges in Swartz were changed because more first year students are enrolling than the residence halls can accommodate, Commerford said. He added that the number of students living off campus is down sharply, compoundingthe housing woes.

"The number [of first year students] we expect to enroll is 896, which is 26 more than we can comfortably fit in the facilities," he explained.

Commerford added that first year students have been assigned to live in Hulley House, Leiser House and Carey House as well to alleviate some of the over-crowding.

Commerford added that the converted doubles in Swartz were used in that capacity previous to 1986.

Lara Sobol '96, a student living in one of the converted triples in Smith, said she has no complaints about the size of her room. "It's definitely big enough," she said.

Becky Horton '96, another student in one of the converted triples, agreed with Sobol that she had more than enough space in her room to live comfortably.

Julia Diaz '95, a student in a converted double on the A wing of Swartz, said she is not so fortunate.

"The room is really small. We can't do much with it," she said.

Melissa Eash '95, a resident on the B wing of Swartz, said she is unhappy with her room as well.

"I'm not not happy at all. It's like a cubby hole. It's way too small," she said. She added that she was not told she would be living in a converted double until the summer.

Commerford said only 410 students will be living off campus this year, which is 70 less than last year.

"You can attribute that to sophomore rush. The juniors and seniors that would normally move downtown are filling in the spots in the fraternity houses," he explained. "There has been an increase in the number of requests for spaces on campus."

Commerford said he is counting on the assistance of the students to make the housing changes work.

"It's obviously not the most desirable situation. The patience and cooperation of the students living there is appreciated," he said.

permanent new chair-back seats on the floor (which should be installed by the end of September) and 126 seats in the section closest to the annex.

Last year's seating near the annex consisted of temporary bleachers that were set up and taken down each game; however, such seating will become a permanent fixture this year.

The total seating area for the renovated Davis Gym is 2000 fans. If there is sufficient demand, officials will allow 500 more fans inside the gym area in the "standing room only" sections.

This new policy of a 2500 capacity level inside the gymnasium clears the University from any violation of fire code restrictions.

Ventilation has been improved inside the complex and new resilient flooring has also been added to the weight room annex.

The Botany Building has been renovated to accommodate the Career Development Center, which has already moved its offices from the Carnegie Building, and the Personnel Office. Both departments will benefit from improved and expanded space within the building.

A redecoration of the Admissions Office in Freas Hall, Maxwell hopes, will enhance the appearance of the area and therefore "leave a better impression on perspective students and their parents."

A connecting road has been put in place to make exit from University parking facilities easier. The road connects the parking lot, which runs behind Phi Kappa Psi to midway between Kappa Delta Rho and Theta Chi, to Fraternity Road.

In addition to all the renovations and improvements, the Physical Plant continued routine summer maintenance. The Chapel Tower was repainted, trees were trimmed and pathways were repaved.

Future plans for additional renovations are pending.

The Old Bison is expected to undergo renovations that, according to Maxwell, will provide students with more social space, space for the Craft Shop (currently in the basement of Hunt Hall), and office space for student organizations.

The Trustees are expected, at their next meeting in November, to approve renovations for Taylor Hall. The building would then accommodate the Economics Department, the Multi-Cultural Center, the International and Off-Campus Education office, classrooms, seminar rooms, and a computer laboratory.

Commerford also expects Larison Hall, depending on financial resources, to be the next residence hall to undergo major renovations.

New wristband policy implemented

Greek organizations primary groups affected by new alcohol regulations

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Department of Public Safety, the Student Security Advisory Committee, the Alcohol Policy Task Force, and the division of Student Services have amended University alcohol policy to include wristband policy enforcement procedures.

The addition of the wristband procedure should help prevent violations of the underage drinking policy within the Greek system.

Existing University alcohol policy guidelines are still in effect, including a segregated serving area with one entrance only that is constantly monitored by an authorized person. A monitor must also be present at the entrance to the house or event to check identification cards and distribute the wristbands.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Student identified as over 21 wears wristband as proof of age.

A person must present a Bucknell identification card for admittance and a valid proof of age for a wristband.

If the person is twenty-one or older, he is given a wristband. Any guests to the event must sign in and be accompanied by a Bucknell sponsor.

The monitor at the entrance of the segregated serving area must see a person's wristband before he can enter the area and receive the beer.

No person is permitted more than one beer at a time. If the event is designated BYOB (bring your own beer) the person must present a punch card before receiving a beer.

Consumption of the alcohol will be confined to previously determined designated party areas.

"The new system is going to be beneficial in that it enables more social mobility," commented Pete Brady '93, President of the Inter-Fraternity Council. "It's a good policy that can work."

Two random security checked will be conducted by Public Safety officers who will check the identifications and wristbands of five or more people in the common area to assess compliance.

Any under-age person found with a wristband and alcohol will be charged by the University. The group sponsoring the event will also be charged.

Blake awarded fellowship

Richard J. Nelson, Director of Alumni Relations, has announced that Professor Jody Blake, Art Department, has been chosen as the 1992 Alumni Faculty Fellowship Award winner. Blake will use the award to continue her research into the interaction between modern art and jazz music. A $1,000 stipend, underwritten by the Bucknell University Alumni Association, supplements the distinction.

Cause of power outage identified

On Thursday, August 27 at 4:05 p.m. the failure of a connector on the high-voltage feeder caused facilities in the Computer Center, Dana Engineering, Bertrand Library, Weis Center and the Science Complex to be temporarily out of order. Physical Plant crew located the problem and restored power by 10:35 p.m.

Air conditioning in Coleman, Freas, Vaughan Literature and Marts Halls was also temporarily out of order because of a pump motor failure on the cooling system. Physical Plant crews promptly corrected the problem.

New Task force formed

A task force formed by President Gary Sojka and Lee Idleman, chair of the Board of Trustees, will develop a list of funding needs of the University in the hopes of reaching an agreement on institutional budget priorities. Members of the task force will focus on three categories of needs: student support (including financial aid); curricular, co-curricular, program, and faculty support, including endowed faculty chairs and professorships; and facilities needs.

Students serving on the committee are Chandra Guinn '93, Brian Mannix '94, J.D. Moriarty '94, Mare Rasmussen '93 and Eva Szreniawski '93.

Wellness events scheduled

Aerobics, intramural, and club sports are among the activities being sponsored by the recreation department for the fall semester.

Aerobics classes will be held in the Dance Studio located on the second floor of the fieldhouse.

Education Guaranteed

Community colleges have responded to their graduates' fear of employment with an experimental program that guarantees they will graduate with the necessary skills to compete in today's limited job market.

Pilot programs at colleges in Illinois offer benefits such as the option of returning to college free of cost if the graduate does not think he has the necessary skills to succeed after entering the job market. Maryland community colleges offer students the possibility of, if they are still unemployed three months after graduation, to go back to school and receive 12 tuition-free credits.

More Term Papers, Please

Students at Monmouth College in New Jersey have petitioned their faculty to administer more term papers and essay exams and less multiple choice, "fill in the bubble" exams.

A Student Government spokesperson said that students simply wanted a testing option for evaluation. Although faculty are not forced to comply, many instructors have done so, noting that students taking an active role in their education alternatives is a positive sign for the future.

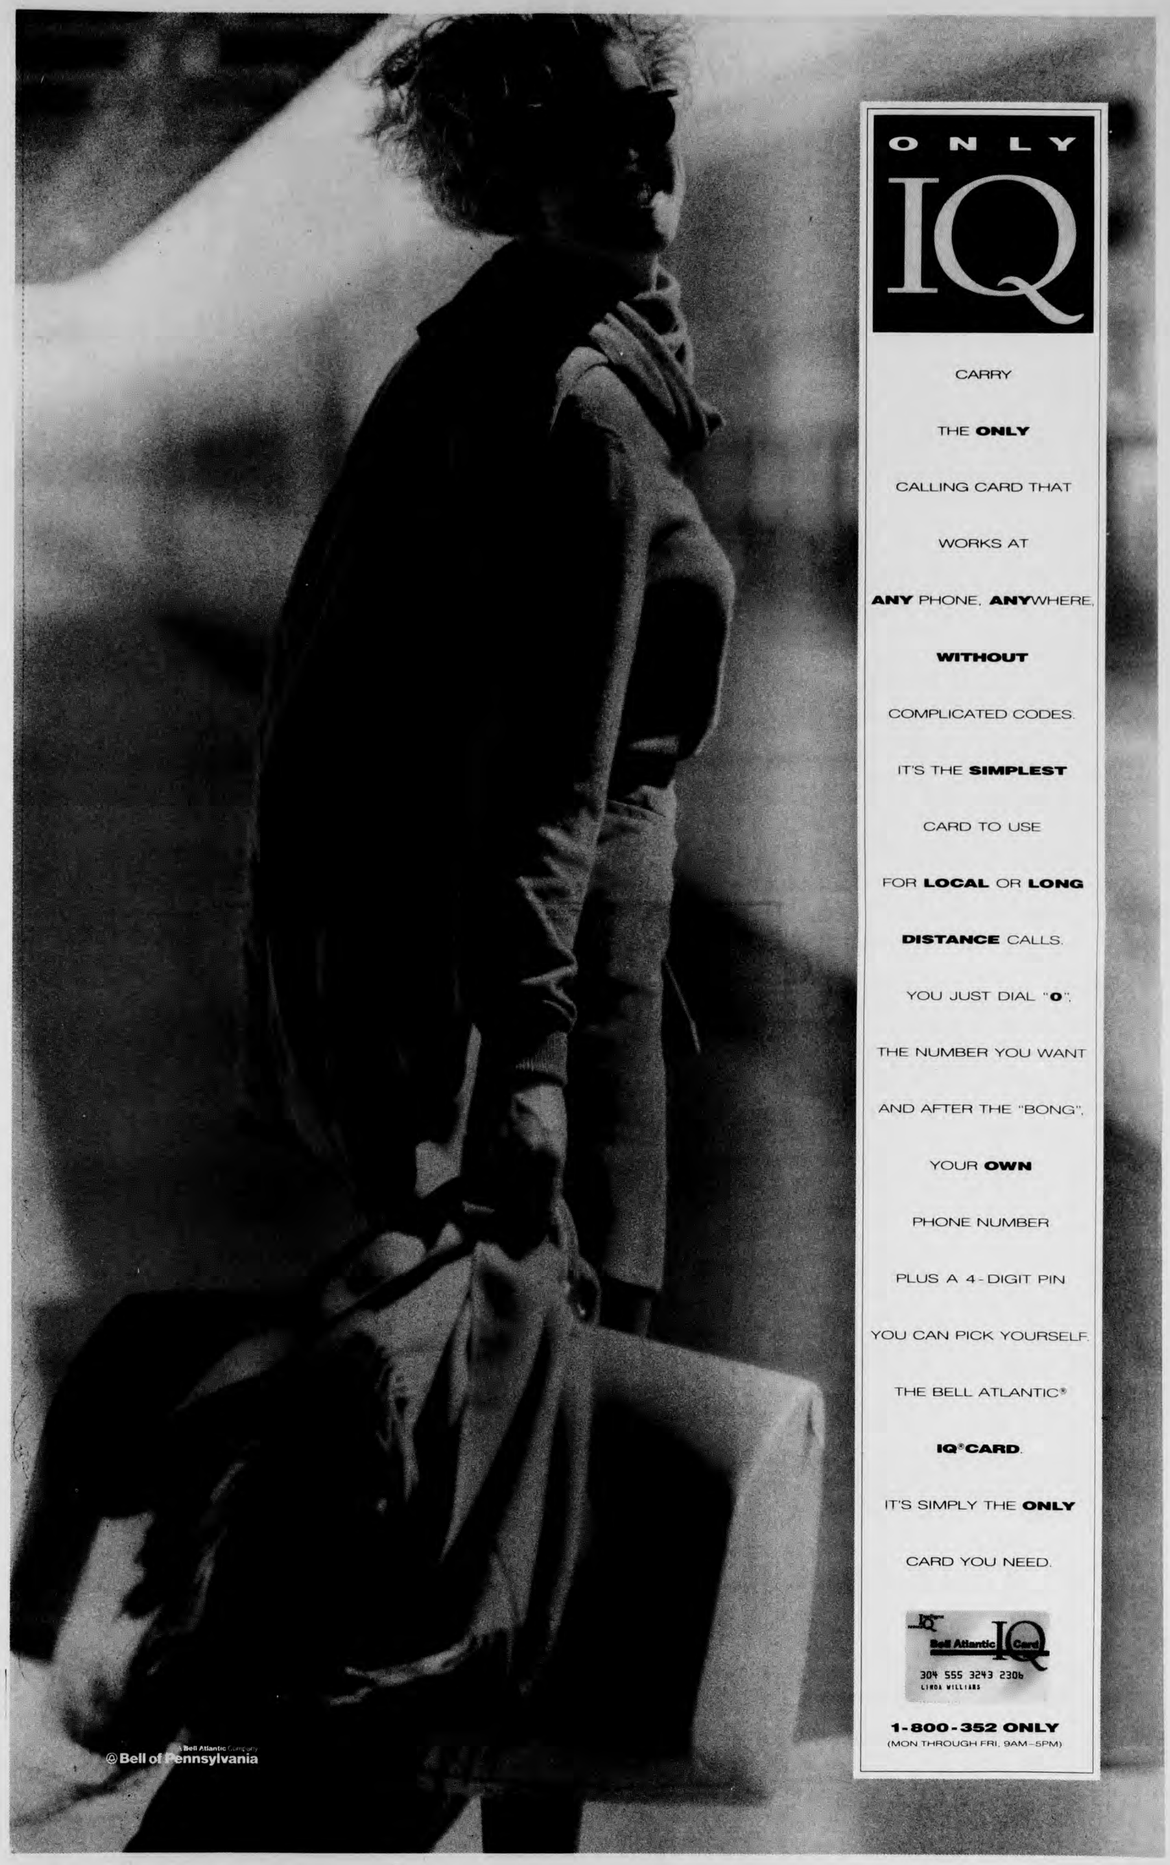
Vote for Robert Abbiati as Freshman Class President



Students welcomed at convocation

"Experiments With Truth" was the theme that Larry Shinn, Vice President for Academic Affairs, conveyed to his audience at the annual Convocation ceremony held Monday, August 31 at the Weis Center.

Convocation serves the University two-fold, first as an opportunity to recognize student and faculty honors and, secondly, to formally welcome the incoming Freshman class to campus.

"If there is any single truth I would urge you to explore while you are at Bucknell," Shinn recommended in his comments to the Class of 1996, "it would be for you to learn through experiences of those different from yourselves."

Shinn reflected on the life of Indian political activist Mahatma Ghandi as he challenged his audience to use "encounters with others whose looks or ideas are different from [their] own." He suggested that the new students consider "Ghandi's notion of living one's life as a series of experiments with truth" a helpful anecdote to apply to their educational careers at Bucknell.

"If there is any single truth I would urge you to explore .... it would be for you to learn through experiences of those different from yourselves"
—Larry Shinn
Vice President for Academic Affairs

Faculty awards were presented to Jeffrey Bowen, Physics; Charles Clapp, Chemistry; and Jean Shackelford, Economics, who all received the Christian and Mary F. Lindback for Distinguished Teaching. Marc Schloss, Anthropology, was the recipient of the Class of 1956 Lectureship award.

Eugenia P. Gerdes, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and Thomas P. Rich, Dean of the College of Engineering, presented student honors to approximately 70 upperclassmen who have distinguished themselves within the academic community.

Ruth Davies '93, member of Phi Beta Kappa honor society and recipient of the Samuel Lewis Ziegler Prize for English composition and literature, commented that Shinn's speech "really made you think. I wish someone had given me that speech three years ago," said Davies. "I hope the freshmen realize that education is about seeking the truth, as Dr. Shinn said, and not just going to school for three years so you can get a job."

Multiple students arrested off campus

Excessive noise, underage drinking causes neighbors to file complaints with police

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Chief of Police Donald Heiter reports that three code enforcement officers will continue to inspect the student populated areas of South Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Avenues, as well as Brown, St. Catherine, St. Louis, and St. George Streets.

Talk to the neighbors. Suggest they call you and not the police department.
—Donald Heiter
Chief of Police

Reports of excessive noise, underage drinking, littering, and urinating in public have prompted the police to respond and issue 15 arrests since August 25. Besides arrests, local landlords will soon be notified as to the location of the parties.

Warnings are no longer issued because, according to Heiter, "Students don't heed them." Multiple residents live in each dwelling and each time a warning was issued, a different housemate would respond. Now, if a party is raided and underage drinking is involved, those furnishing the alcohol may be fined up to $1500 for each minor served.

Heiter reminds students that they were forewarned of the borough codes when they signed their off-campus housing agreements through the University. The contract contained information about recycling, noise violations, and the benefits of having a code enforcement officer.

According to Heiter, the police are "not against the students. We'd like to help the students out." Another duty of the code enforcements officers is to ensure that rental units are fit for habitation.

Regarding the recent rash of problems, Heiter advises, "Don't overload the house or yard. Police your own party." The chief of Most importantly he says to "Talk to the neighbors. Suggest they call you and not the police department."

Stechschulte to direct health center resources

BY CARISSA ITLE

Bucknell is welcoming a new face at the Ziegler Health Center. Dr. Don Stechschulte has joined the staff as the new director of medical resources.

Dr. Stechschulte attended Denison University in Grandville, Ohio. He received his graduate degree from the Princeton Theological Center, his masters at Divinity, and his MD from UCE in the Dominican Republic.

Board certified in family medicine, Stechschulte previously worked in a private practice in Pittsburgh. Before his career in medicine, he taught at The Lawrenceville school in New Jersey.

Stechschulte views his new position at Bucknell as the perfect way to return to academia.

The Student Health Service at Ziegler Health center holds hours seven days a week and can be reached at 524-1401.

Korbar, a public safety officer, sustained her injuries while evacuating the house.

"By the time she got there the smoke was bad," said Hauck.

"She risked her life for people she didn't even know when she ran into that house. It was a tremendous effort. We are really grateful."

According to Hauck, the response of the University community in general has been incredible.

"Our intent is to get them back in business in the house as soon as possible," said President Gary Sojka.

"Meanwhile, we have tried to minimize the impact of the fire with regards to both academic performance and social matters."

The University has provided food for the TKE brothers who normally eat meals prepared by the house cook and has made rooms available in fifth Trax, making it possible for them to stay together.

In addition, the response of the other campus fraternities has been exceptional.

Many fraternities have offered space and meals to the brothers.

"Everyone's been really great," said Hauck. "we were lucky, it could have been much worse."

Accepting the challenge of poetry

Nick Carbo, resident poet at Bucknell this fall, will give the first of two readings this Sunday at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

BY KRISTIE ANN ROBSON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Bucknell's current poet-in-residence, Nick Carbo, combines creativity, objectivity, and sensitivity with a rare sense of humor. Students will have the opportunity to experience Carbo's talents in his first public reading on September 13, at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

Contrary to the dead genius or snooty intellectual dressed head to toe in black stereotypes of a poet, Carbo not only expresses a deep caring about his work, but he bases the success of his work on the readers' emotions. His poems are written in an easy to grasp manner in a language that challenges your understanding, instead of your ability to use a dictionary.

Having grown up in the small city of Legazpi, in the Philippine Islands, Carbo received his undergraduate degree from Bennington College. He started writing poetry during the summer of 1988 when he was 23 years old. Like many other young poets, his early works were filled with the emotions of heart-break. He readily admits that his first poems were dreadful. In his maturity, he has moved onto more important issues. Today, he is recapturing the social and political conditions of the Philippines in his poetry.

No stranger to the Bucknell campus, Carbo spent the spring of his senior year at Bucknell as one of the first participants in the Stadler Semester for Younger Poets. Later, while attending Sarah Lawrence College in New York for his MFA, Carbo co-founded the literary magazine "420."

Since then, his poetry has appeared in such literary magazines as "W'Orcs" and "The National Poetry Magazine." Carbo has also co-authored a chapbook collection of poetry entitled Breakfast at the Cake & Steak with fellow Stadler Semester poet Diane Fraser. In addition to having been the featured poet on "Heritage," a nationally televised PBS program, Carbo received an internship in New York City two years ago and currently sits on the board of directors of the Hudson Valley Writers' Center. Despite fame and success, Carbo is humble and reluctant to mention his status.

When asked what would make his first poetry reading more desirable than sitting in a cozy bed, Carbo replied,"September 13th will offer a chance for students to gain a different perspective on a culture far different from their own." Through the eyes of a poet, Carbo is offering the student body a chance to travel, and experience the emotion behind the news. Carbo says the hard part of being a poet is choosing what to care about in poetry. Whether it is the suffering in post-hurricane Florida or the oppression in South America, it is difficult to sort and write on one event when there are so many in the world. A poet, he feels, is a world antenna to emotion and distress.

> I had no need for clothes
> My nakedness was song
> For the sun
> Brown crescendos
> From the tip of my toes
> To the top of my head
> —Nick Carbo

In regard to what inspires a poet, Carbo simply replied "the day." From the sounds of morning to the setting of the sun a poet is enlightened to write. Even the simple delicacy of a woman's ear lobe is cause enough for a love poem. Engaging in the rich detail and imagery of Carbo's poetry, it's easy to agree that poets contain turbo-charged sensory response systems.

Carbo is quick to choose Denise Duhamel, as his favorite poet. Bucknell's fall poet-in-residence three years ago, Duhamel married Carbo in Bucknell Hall on August 22. "We were both elated to hear I got the position because we found that Bucknell provides a truly creative and nurturing atmosphere for poets," Carbo said. "I feel as if I know almost everyone." Carbo adds to his list of favorite poets Anne Sexton, a confessional poet and vocal feminist. Her strength in imagery is what captures Carbo's admiration. Carbo is excited by the writing of contemporary American women poets. He respects their openness and fighting flare.

This year's poet-in-residence is enthusiastic about his writing and expects to finish his first manuscript during his residency. He is equally excited to be sharing his work with the Bucknell community, stating,"I'm looking forward to writing quality poems while I'm here and working with students who share my interest in poetry."

So you want to be an actor?

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Anyone who has seen the movie A Chorus Line knows the tension and anxiety that accompanies auditioning for the theater. In Bucknell's mini-version of Broadway, the department of theater and dance, the same fears of rejection worked themselves on the student actors. The auditions for the department's first production, The Singular Life of Albert Knobbs, were no exception.

The auditions, which took place last Sunday and Monday night, pulled in many of the "veterans" of theater, as well as a large number of first-year students. Gwynne Luminati '96 , reacted to the proceedings by admitting, "I'm always nervous before I try out, but after I feel a great relief-then a great anticipation," whereas Carol McLaughlin '96 stated,"I'm not particularly nervous. There's nothing to lose."

Much of an actor's feelings towards the auditions is the result of the director's format. Director Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, chose to hold open auditions for Albert Knobbs. Actors read selected scenes on stage while other hopeful thespians sat in the audience. Despite the fact that most people were absorbed in practicing their own lines, the auditioners were essentially performing in front of the people against whom they were competing.

Bryan Clark '91, who directed last year's production of The Crucible, pulled auditioners into a separate room where they performed privately. According to Valerie Marsden '93, even though she can judge her performance better in an open audition, closed auditions relieve much of the stress. "Open auditions are very difficult and distracting," Marsden says. "It's easier to feel the competition when other people are watching, but at the same time you feel like you've made more of an accomplishment afterwards."

Other upcoming auditions in the department of theatre and dance include: The Bucknell Dance Company, Sunday, September 13; A Children's Story, November 16 and 17; December 6 and 7; Jan Plan; and Our Country's Good, March 21 and 22.

Since there is no "best" way to run auditions, directors choose the method that they're most comfortable with. And even though actors try to mask their insecurity behind the parts they are reading, it just wouldn't be an audition if there weren't impatient actors pacing the lobby of the theater, mumbling lines to themselves. And from the advice of Mary Jordan '93, "Being nervous just doesn't do you any good."

"Singles" soundtrack promises Seattle's finest

BY MIKE LETTS

I never bought an original motion picture soundtrack for the simple reason that spending fifteen dollars for one or two good songs never seemed worth it. However, that changed only two weeks ago when I purchased "Singles," a soundtrack that's dominated by some of Seattle's finest.

Although the movie won't be out for some time yet, if it can match the soundtrack, it should be magnificent. Included are two brand-new songs from Pearl Jam and Paul Westerberg (one of which, "Dyslexic Heart," you may have seen on MTV recently), along with single efforts by Soundgarden, Alice in Chains, Smashing Pumpkins, Screaming Trees, Mother Love Bone, and Mudhoney. A solo effort by Chris Cornell (lead singer of Soundgarden), a wonderful cover of the Led Zepplin tune "Battle of Evermore," done by the Lovemongers, and Jimi Hendrix's "May This Be Love" make sure that the album never sinks below the outstanding line.

The best feature of this album is that, excepting the Zepplin and Hendrix covers, the songs are all brand new. The type of music ranges from the powerful chord-driven grunge of Alice in Chains' "Would?" and Soundgarden's "Birth Ritual" to the melodic and rather happy Westerberg tune, "Dyslexic Heart," and then drifts into the beautifully composed "May This Be Love" from Jimi Hendrix. Chris Cornell's "Seasons" is an acoustic effort, and Smashing Pumpkins' "Drown" closes the album in climactic fashion.

Although it's impossible to pick a "best song," Pearl Jam's "State of Love and Trust" and Mother Love Bone's "Chloe Dancer/Crown of Thorns" seem to stand out amongst the rest. "State of Love and Trust," with typical Pearl Jam intensity and lead singer Eddie Vedder's remarkable voice, attains a level of fury. On the other end of the scale,"Chloe Dancer/Crown of Thorns," a beautiful and yet powerful ballad, makes the typical soundtrack love song seem inferior in comparison.

With great composition, intriguing lyrics, and personal stories wrapped into thirteen songs, this album can be considered one of the best original motion picture soundtracks, if not one of the best albums, in recent memory. For frequent music listeners, and especially for the Seattle music scene follower, "Singles" will be a refreshing mix to help break the monotony of overplayed music.

Why not really renovate Davis Gym?

Almost all students are awestruck by the immaculate appearance of Bucknell. As tour guides lead groups of prospectives from Georgian brick building to yet another tastefully done Georgian brick building, comments can be clearly heard about our beautifully maintained campus. It seems obvious to parents that their twentysome thousand dollars will be well spent by those in charge of the budget. Why then, after a decent sum of money was used on recent renovations of Davis Gym, will one-fourth of the student population be forcibly crowded out of this season's basketball games?

By adding padded seating and other niceties to the gym, the seating capacity of the facility has been harnessed at 2500. This ceiling has been imposed at a time when the number of students attending Bucknell is on the rise for the third year in a row. The new reserve seating policy is also being initiated at a period of peak popularity of the basketball team.

While basketball is by no means the reason that students attend an academically elite school such as Bucknell, the sport certainly has served as a unifying force of the students. Besides classes, it is one of the only common bonds that most students hold.

In recent years, basketball has brought pride to the University and those attending it. Countless faces were painted orange and blue as we appeared on national television during our bid for an NCAA berth in the Patriot League Championship against Fordham last year.

Supporting the team even lended tradition to the University. Finding a spot to sit meant gathering an hour or so before gametime, often with dinner in hand.

The basketball games also provide a common ground upon which students, faculty, administration, and the surrounding community can associate on congenial terms. Vice-presidents can be heard discussing more than finance and philosophy professors show that they are full of more than abstract thoughts. In Davis Gym, townspeople appreciate the fact that they live in a community filled with college students. Students learn that adults are just as capable as themselves of commiting noise violations.

The reason why reserve seating must be imposed is appreciated. No one enjoyed knowing that they were standing in the midst of a huge fire violation as they peered over shoulders for a view of the hardwood. The fact that there will not be enough padded benchroom for all the students, faculty, administration, and townspeople that enjoy attending, is frustrating.

Five-year, Soviet style budgets aside, why could the University not have made the renovations that were really called for? The money to "make do for the time being" was found. Why couldn't the funds for a truly functional gym be located? To those who pay 80% of the bills, the place is a priority. When today's students toured Bucknell, they saw the outside of everything. Campus looked beautiful from the exterior. Now the University should continue its capital renovation crusade and move directly to Davis Gym.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Great bunny controversy begins: a pro/con

TO THE EDITOR:

As a frequenter of the Bucknell Learning Community (BLC) and an avid reader of its most prestigious and pellucid newspaper (the Bucknellian), I am both shocked and appalled and disgusted with the most ribald cartoon on page 4 of the Aug 28, 1992 issue. The subject: Energizer Bunny. The artist: Steve McNutt. The response: Righteous Indignation.

While usually engaged by McNutt's delightfully raffish charms, the underlying sexual subtext which this inappropriate etching erected was blatantly (and inappropriately) inappropriate. Now, I understand that in this less ethically constipated age of sexual decadence, moral decline, and over-the-counter-suppositories, a certain degree of laxitiveness can be made to pass through more easily. Granted. BUT, lines must be drawn.

Exhibit A: A long-eared, ambiguously gendered bunny sporting dark sunglasses and an aloof smirk reclines casually on a bed with a love-struck, HUMAN female wearing nothing but a blissful grin and a diaphanous sheet. On the floor: long, thick drumsticks. On the lamp: women's panties. On my face: righteous indignation.

The mere idea of mixing intimacy with battery-powered gadgets can be shocking enough. But when flocked with obvious sexual indiscretion and overt bestiality the result is truly for the birds. Animal intercourse aside, in this age of infections, injections, and out-of-wedlock conceptions, discussion of prophylactics must not be sheathed. Serious point: We can not forget that sex in the 90's requires protection. No comic strip, movie, or magazine should ever imply otherwise. In this cartoon the little bunny condoms (LBC's) are conspicuously absent. Just like the good sense of the artist responsible. Fatuous fluff such as this does not belong in The Bucknellian.

TO THE EDITOR:

As an avid reader of Bucknell's most prestigious and pellucid newspaper, I would like to give Kudos to the delightfully raffish young artist, Steve "keeps going and going..." McNutt. Printed in the Aug. 28, 1992 issue of The Bucknellian, his brilliant political satire hops into the annals of cartoon history.

Admittedly, upon initial inspection, I misconstrued the etching's profound post-Freudian elasticity. However, after further and continuous scrutiny of this cartoon, the intrinsic political commentary erupts forth with frenzied poetic vehemence.

In the day-glow era of MTV's, NES's, and STD's, pop-culture commercialism has metamorphisized us into no more than lascivious creatures of the flesh. McNutt appoints the Energizer Bunny to be a symbol for this Corporate Conglomerate Conspiracy (C.C.C.). Advertising's neon definitions of happiness: long-life, durability, and sexual motility have sucked us into an emotional vacuum of unquenchable lust. According to McNutt, naked capitalism is screwing the American consumer.

Of course, McNutt's conscious artistic decision NOT to depict prophylactics of any sort blatantly illustrates Big Business's plot to impregnate us with this virus of distorted priorities.

This cartoon is also a bold pro-feminist fanfare. We live in a world where men have been reduced to little more than anthropomorphic rabbits, reproducing indiscriminately with no concern for "family values." It is no wonder that the victimized human female should subconsciously drape her underwear over the lamp in a desperate cry for sexual illumination.

But, as in the case of all astute allegorical assessments (A.A.A.'s), the answer lies literally at the foot of the bed. The bass drum of the new revolution has yet to be beaten.

In this age of male chauvinism and corporate despotism, we must remain vigilant to the beast of the big-screen-post-modernistic-white-corporate-male-oppressor. While McNutt subtly acknowledges the obvious need for prophylactic use (through its absence), he also suggests a need for cerebral condoms to sheath us from the viciously pernicious dangers of our corporate oppressors. Long live the revolution! Lead us, McNutt! You should, indeed, bombard The Bucknellian with more of your profound and mature works of art.

Freshmen move-in a success due to many

TO THE EDITOR:

In the August 28, 1992 issue of The Bucknellian it was recorded that fraternity members were responsible for moving in the freshman upon arrival. While this is in part true, the Interfraternity Council would also like to thank the orientation assistants and the Bucknell custodial staff for their efforts in moving in our new friends. This is a worthwhile program and without the help of all parties, the process would not be a sucess.

Professor explains fight behind the incinerator

TO THE EDITOR:

What is OUE? Very, very briefly, here's the story. Two years ago a subsidiary of Union Pacific Railroad, USPCI (United States Pollution Control, Inc.), applied for a license to build a huge hazardous waste incinerator twelve miles north of Bucknell. The company chose a site just off Route 15 north, next to the Susquehanna River and across the highway from a huge new federal prison complex. Since then, there has been continuing controversy over a variety of issues surrounding the proposed incinerator. These include health and safety questions, the proposed site's proximity to the prison complex, the reputability of USPCI and Union Pacific, the neutrality of the DER (the State Department of Resources which will, or will not, issue USPCI a licensing permit), and other matters. To many opponents, the central issue is one of citizens' rights: what kind of "democracy" do we have if such an incinerator can be forcefully imposed on a community even though 95% of its members don't want it?

At the center of the resistance to USPCI has been the Organizations United for the Environment (OUE). OUE was founded in the mid-1970s, in response to the plans for a huge landfill, one that ultimately was put into operation, just north of the proposed incinerator site. In 1990, when USPCI's application became public, OUE began a vigorous organizing drive to try to get DER to deny a licensing permit. As of now, the company's application is in the second phase of a permitting process that will take at least two years, and could take many more, and all before the company can begin construction of its $100,000,000 incinerator. In its efforts to stop the company, OUE has recruited about 15-20,000 members, including about 1,000 in the Lewisburg area. Though the OUE has thousands of members, the great majority confine their participation to an occasional donation. One of OUE's most successful efforts has been to pressure all the politicians representing the area to voice opposition to the incinerator including Arlen Specter and his opponent in the coming election, Lynn Yeakel.

In 1991, Bucknell's faculty unanimously recorded its opposition to the incinerator on many grounds, including the possibility that an incinerator a dozen miles from campus would pose a threat to the collective health and to Bucknell's ability to attract students in the future. To this point, even though we have a Bucknell chapter of OUE, very few students and faculty members have participated in the struggle. Nonetheless, the battle between OUE and USPCI is likely to be a protracted one, and anyone at Bucknell inclined to lend a hand to OUE will be warmly welcomed.

OUE, whose one paid employee is the office manager, has spent about $200,000 of donated funds during the past two years. Almost all of this money has been paid to consultants and to attorneys to fight USPCI's application in every way possible. Most of OUE's money has been raised through dances, concerts, contests, quilt making, and a variety of other kinds

OPINIONS

Why you should state your opinion today

Ever since I can remember, all of my friends have asked me for advice on various subjects ranging from how they should wear their hair to what they should do about the troubles that they have encountered while fighting with their significant other halves (or insignificant as the case may sometimes be). I am known to be a very opinionated individual and it always escapes me as to why another would come to me for advice. Most people already know the answer to the problem that they are presenting to me and as far as I know, they could have figured out the answer themselves and would have done just as well had they spoken with a brick wall.

But anyway, rather than delve right into the article that I am writing at this juncture, I would like to say a few words as a sort of introduction to the opinions page. I find myself and my opinion in the position of Opinion Editor and I'd like to address some of the issues that may be raised by an individual that may take the time to write a letter to the editor with the intent to publish it in The Bucknellian. If you, who are taking the time to read this article right now may be interested in writing a letter, the rules are quite simple. In fact, they are printed right in the masthead of the facing page. I would also like to point out that a letter written must be of literary value as I would rather run a string of ads or cartoons by yours truly (and believe me, I'm a horrible artist) than spontaneous verbosity written on napkins that you got at the Bison while catching a munch between classes.

I understand that the case with many publications is that they will take anything because they don't have enough. That is not the case here. I assure you. So, after that brief interlude of important facts that I had to get off my chest I will resume the opinion that I had begun.

As stated before, I am a very opinionated individual who forwarded the question as to why people would ask me something (as if I am an authority on the subject) when nine times out of ten they know the answer themselves. Since you are only reading this and cannot give me a verbal response, I will give the my formulated answer in just a few short words.

PEOPLE LIKE TO BE TOLD WHAT TO DO.

I don't know if I can make it any more clear than this but rather than just leave you hanging with no backing, as though I am casting down pearls of wisdom from my high horse, I will give my reasoning. You might just ask, who the hell is this guy to print this? My answer is simple. I am the Opinion Editor and this is my opinion. It is also a free country (in some sense and as far as I know) and most people are just too lazy to write themselves, as we (collectively) would rather watch a double-shot of Cheers or the new Beverly Hill 90210 episode (pardon me while retch). Other may say they are too busy and the truth be far from that in many cases.

So here's my reason. It's inbred in society. Only a very small percentage of the population on this planet are leaders and the rest are followers. Society breeds indecision and in the day and age that we live, many people would rather follow the masses than make the decisions themselves. People think, 'It's just makes my life easier if I'm told what to do," and the sad thing is that many people stay in this mindframe. I write this particualarly to the student populous of this school, knowing that if even one person can gain any self-realization on this subject that I'll be happy.

You people have gotten into a prestigous school and it is necessary to make decisions yourself. If not today, then when? As life goes on it continually becomes easier to fall into the follower niche and say that you'll do something yourself. I say do it today. All of the people here are intelligent human beings with a sense of what they want and if people fall into a lazy lifestyle it will be continually harder to break free from restraints that you may be setting for yourself today.

A FOURTH YEAR PERSPECTIVE
By Andrew Cohen

Whether I'd go Greek again

Two and a half long years ago I witnessed what I thought to be my first "casualty of rush." A woman who lived downstairs had decided to drop out of rush before the first round of cuts were returned. To my sophomoric first-year intellect, the reason for her decision was clear: she knew that she was not good enough to get into the sororities that she wanted so she cut her losses. The woman was invited back to all eight sororities, and in truth, she was too good for them. However, this realization has been a long time coming for me.

I swallowed the Greek bait—hook, line and sinker. People said, "Going Greek is a good experience. You get to meet people, you have a body of brothers/sisters so close they'll do anything for you, you have leadership opportunities, and besides the social scene here is so Greek-based, you've got to do it." Nothing could be further from the truth. You do not have to go Greek. You have options.

I joined a fraternity and served as its vice-president and public relations chair; I was elected by the presidents of the fraternities to serve on the Interfraternity Council Executive Board, where I served until my deactivation last spring. I do not speak from a disenfranchised perspective, but rather as someone who experienced the essence of the system.

I certainly do not pretend to take any type of moral high ground against the system. In fact, it is quite the opposite. Only by looking in the mirror and retching when I saw the type of person I had become, am I qualified to raise the following issues. (It is also important that I am honest about my reasons for leaving. I left not because of any moral awakening, but because I could not stay sober long enough to write my name. That was my problem, not the system's.) Yet, my time away from Greek life has led me to realize that while in the system there is a tendency to forget the "kind of person" you think you are, in favor of the herd's inclinations.

As a first-year student, I came to Bucknell berating my parents for their interference in my life. I was my own person, not their juvenile, dependent, son. I came to school eager to experience my individuality for the first time. Yet, within a few months the burden was too great, and I sought refuge in the acceptance of a group. I said that I was only going to rush. But it was so enticing. People seemed to like me. After no more than a half-hour conversation with any one brother, I decided that they were going to be my best friends.

From the very first, the things that were me, that were pointedly Andrew Cohen, that comprised my very soul, began to die. The physical pain of being paddled bare-assed was, at that point in my life, indescribable. It brought some of my pledge brothers to tears. Some pops and sons never talked after that night. But I learned that silence was precious. I did not let out a peep, and the brothers "respected that." My welts were a badge of courage.

However, it was the psychological torture that really broke me. I was expected to sit in silence when I saw things that made me sick to my stomach. When brothers senselessly decried my very being, made me feel inhuman, I had to suck it up, to let go of my thoughts, to ignore them, to become numb. This was a hard lesson for me to swallow, and I voiced objections, even mentioning the word, "hazing." But it was too late. My identity was bound in the group. So I learned to ignore myself. One of the brothers told me that it was a simple psychological process whereby the individual is broken down only to be built up as a member of the group. It was working.

You do not have to go Greek. You have options.

We became animals. During "hell week" we slept blindfolded and tied to one another on the bare barroom floor. We were so desperate to sleep on a couch, that when that was announced as the prize for the winner of a drinking contest scored like golf, none of the pledges averaged less than a birdie for each of the nine "holes." My three-puke effort, however, was not enough to "earn" a spot on the couch. Yet, by that time, I had escaped any remnants of myself as an individual, and rather began to enjoy my debasement. I was so excited that I would soon become a member, and there would be others for me to terrorize. By the next year, I had become what I had held in contempt.

(Incidentally, many of my friends in other fraternities had it much harder. And I am, in fact, grateful because my old fraternity was relatively lax from what I hear).

I miss my friends from my first year. After pledging, it was never the same. Many of us went different places. Paradoxically, my social opportunities were enlarged and shrunken all at once. I had an instant group of friends called brothers. But everyone outside of the group was somehow not as good as those in it. Social options immediately became limited by a set of letters.

As a brother little changed. I ceased to be a thinker, if I ever was one. I was always busy jumping on the bandwagon, or trying to lead one. But as for doing anything for myself, that was impossible; myself had long since left. The silence I had learned as a pledge took a turn for the worse and I became a joiner.

It was really no one's fault. An opening for a sexist remark or act would occur, someone would take it, everyone would take it. Never, in my year and a half as an active member, did I hear anyone really stand up against sexism in the hundreds of times that it occurred. I did not pride myself as a sexist, but it was just so damn funny, everyone roared with approving laughter. In fact, when I was vice-president I was the author of the most popular dirt letter in recent memory.

I always thought I was the "kind of person" who deplored racism. Yet, when a small group got together and began making racist remarks, my courage had disappeared like the welts. Dumb silence pervaded my psyche. I did not know what to say, how to say it. Everyone was having such a good time, how could I spoil it? Frequently, Jews were the target of disparaging remarks. While the anger rose within me, I shut up and smiled. Now it was my so-called people. How could there be a "my people" when there was no me?

So it was that I forgot myself. My insecurity had been filled by the ethos of the herd. I was now a leader of the system. I wrote scathing newspaper stories against those who, like I am doing now, opposed it. And I made the thing look so beautiful on paper that no one would dare write the libel you are reading. I wrote rush letters praising "our diverse brotherhood which maintains a close-knit sense of unity." All the while, my experience told a very different story. While I stress that this is only my experience, I can also tell you that it is not a unique one—not unique to me, nor to the group to which I used to belong. My friends at another fraternity would regularly announce their intention to "cruise down to Hunt and get some snapper" from whomever happened to be awake. To my knowledge, my old fraternity never crossed the line of action when it came to racism and anti-semitism, while I know of at least two other houses that did.

I do not believe that Greeks are bad people. The majority of my close friends are Greek. But I do think that the system encourages people to value their membership in the group above their individuality and sense of self, which makes it easy for people to become foreign to themselves, to partake in the aforementioned activities. Now, many sophomores are getting what may or may not be their first taste of sororities and fraternities. However, you need not be slaves to the system. Oftentimes I hear people say that they do not really want to rush, but that is the way it is, so they may as well. You can change the way things are. If you do not validate the system, it will cease to rule the university's "social-residential" climate. People will be able to transcend the herd mentality to embark upon genuine relationships which are supportive of their individuality. Such a decision takes a lot of courage, a lot more than I ever had.

TKE thanks Bucknell community

TO THE EDITOR:

The brothers of Tau Kappa Epsilon would like to thank all of the individuals and groups who have helped us in the last week to ease the burdens caused by the fire in our house on Friday afternoon.

First, we would like to extend our gratitude to Bucknell Security, specifically Michele Korbar, who risked her life to make certain all of the members of the house had safely abandoned their rooms. Without her heroics, several individuals may not be alive today, and we are deeply indebted to her.

The House would also like to thank the area fire departments who responded so promptly to the fire call. We greatly appreciated their diligence in putting out the fire, and saving as much of the house as they could.

We are grateful to all of the campus fraternities as well for their generous offerings. It is reassuring to know that "Greek unity" at Bucknell is not just an empty cliche.

We would also like to acknowledge the efforts of the University, specifically Residential Life and Gerry Commerford, for their hard work and understanding in this time of crisis. Without their assistance, the rebuilding process would be severely handicapped.

Finally, we are grateful to the Interfraternity Council for their efforts to make our rush events successful. Without their financial support, rush would have been an impossibility.

We apologize if we have forgotten to thank any groups or individuals in all the commotion. TKE will be back very soon.

of fund-raisers, including sales like the one on September 12. On Saturday, September 12, starting at 8:30 in the morning, the First Annual Giant OUE Yard Sale will take place, at 239 Beagle Club Road. To get there turn right off Route 15 South at the bottom of the hill after you pass Econolodge. There will be signs after the turn to direct you to the sale. This sale has been scheduled for September 12 in part to meet the needs of students who are looking for cheap lamps, dishes, and other small household goods for the new semester. Come early and get the best bargains. All proceeds will go to OUE. OUE predicts it will need at least $150,000 for the coming year, and that is why all Bucknell staff, students, and faculty are encouraged to drop by and buy something at the sale. We have lots of items, most of them useful household goods. We have priced these items to sell them, and that means there are lots of good buys. Also, for the adventuresome, we have a few items whose existence stretches one's understanding of how they came to be produced in the first place, with prices that are particularly low.

For more information about this sale, or about OUE, contact me through the Economics Department. For additional inf ormation about technical and political aspects of the struggle between OUE and USPCI, there are two good sources at Bucknell. The first of these is a file of information that has been accumulating for two years, available at the Reserve Desk in the library. The second source of information on campus is Professor Steve Stamos, of the Department of International Relations. With others, Professor Stamos has arranged to integrate the issue of the incinerator with the fall program of the Environmental Residential College. Contact Professor Stamos for information on the various programs the College has planned which will be open to the entire community.

Brett Cassidy '93 spent long hours in the lab studying the effect of drugs on cancer cells this summer.

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Do you remember planning what you were going to do this summer?

Chances are, when you started thinking about summer plans, you might have considered working at a job in your hometown, an internship with a nearby corporation, or even studying abroad and travelling across the world. But had you considered cancer research as your main summer objective?

Brett Cassidy '93 did. From June 1 to August 18 Cassidy worked at the Jackson Laboratories in Bar Harbor, Maine, researching the effects that substances called interleukins had on tumor cells and the immune system when introduced into the cell body.

Cassidy noted, "We were trying to determine the effect on a tumor cell when injected with interleukin 1. After receiving interleukin 1, the cell starts to produce high amounts of interleukin 6. We wanted to see what conditions and what amounts of interleukin 1 would determine whether or not the tumor survived."

"I found out about the program when I went to the Career Development Center," remarked Cassidy. "The father of a Bucknell senior sent the Career Development Center information about this opportunity for a summer program and so I applied for it in January. I was one of about 320 students who applied for the position. There was an application with essays, as well as necessary teacher recommendations."

Eventually Cassidy became one of the final 24, (12 high-school and 12 college students), who were selected to do summer research in Bar Harbor. Each of the 24 students had a research project on which he or she worked with a staff researcher. Cassidy worked under the guidance of Dr. Robert Evans, a senior staff scientist, also the father of recent BU graduate, Tim Evans.

"I spent every weekday working in the lab and, depending upon how the experiment was going, some weekends. If a sample needed to incubate for three days, I had to check it. It didn't matter if it was a Sunday." The group of 24 received a $2500 stipend for their work as well as free room and board in a mansion which belongs to the Jackson Laboratories. During their free time the group sometimes planned hiking trips at Acadia National Park, biked, or swam at the beach. "The experience was really good," Cassidy commented. "I got to see what research was like. I enjoyed it because I was working on my own. I had the freedom to design the experiments, and was researching for myself. When you work at school it's usually just doing research for another professor."

It took at least one month before Cassidy was able to actually start his work. "A lot of stuff kept going wrong, like the cell cultures were contaminated or something. I guess that I was lucky, though, because a lot of students didn't even get data."

At the end of the summer, the student researchers held a "summer symposium" in order to present the results of their work. Cassidy and Dr. Evans discovered the optimal conditions for introducing interleukin 1 into a tumor cell, the specific amounts of interleukin needed and the period of incubation necessary for a successful cell production of interleukin 6. Cassidy added that Dr. Evans' is trying to publish the findings of the study, complete with his own input.

Cassidy, noting the unique hands-on experience that the program offered, said, "I would definitely recommend this program to others. I'm glad I had the experience."

The Jackson Laboratories run this program every summer and it is open to high school and college students. For more information, concerning this or any other summer program, contact the Career Development Center.

Wash your worries away

Reading these instructions is better than wearing streaked clothes

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Two weeks ago that crumpled pile of clothes on the floor looked clean and smelled good. Now those same boxers, T-shirts, shorts, and jeans reek a potpurri of sweat, your favorite cologne, and last weekend's party. Fortunately, your favorite garments can be rid of the smelly stains that dot them by employing the proper washing procedure.

Do you know where to begin? From the number of pink socks and pairs of tie-dye underwear discarded in the laundry room trashcans each week, it's obvious that while many Bucknellians know how to do differential equations, not many of them know how to clean their own clothes.

THE BASICS

Colored clothes do not mix well with whites. Furthermore, hot water will cause colored clothes (especially red ones) to bleed. So, wash only whites in warm, and colors in cold. Otherwise, pray you look pretty in pink.

Rayon, wool, silk, acetate, and never before dried cottons usually shrink a few sizes when finished in the dryer. Most other clothes will not lose their shape. Read the tag located in the back or sometimes on the article's sideseam. To avoid both the just-rolled-out of bed look and the tedious chore of ironing, remove clothes from the dryer while they are still slightly damp and hang them to dry.

STAIN REMOVAL

Tools of the trade: stain stick, bleach, and hot water

Stain stick is essential for those who do their laundry once a week and for those who wait until their underwear runs out to wash. These concentrated forms of detergent coat the stain and keep it from settling into the fibers of the clothing. This means that you can rub the stick on that blob of purple passion punch and then forget about it, just like you did the night you spilt it.

Bleaches remove the color of the stain. Technically, the stain will still be there, but it will be invisible to the eye. Chlorine bleach is for whites, while non-chlorine bleach may be used to treat white clothes, as well as those that are colored. Check the bottle to make sure that it is safe for color. Also remember to allow the bleach to mix well with the machine water before adding your clothes. Bleach is too strong to pour directly onto clothing. It will either eat away at the fabric or ironically, discolor it.

Hot water loosens stains if it is run quickly over the spot. However, do not allow stains to soak in hot water. This will set the spillage.

Especially difficult stains such as blood, ink pen, lipstick, and fruit juices sometimes require special solutions. For the proper instructions and answers to your other big messes, you can either consult a dry cleaner or call the Philadelphia College of Textile and Science's Stain Hotline at (215) 951-2757.

DRY CLEANERS and LAUNDRY SERVICES

On campus, Mary MacIntosh offers a wash and fold service. Close to campus, Reed's Dry Cleaner's and Laundry Inc. and La Launderette will wash, fold, and even iron your clothes to keep you both looking and smelling good.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

If you are tired of making excuses about that year old soda stain on your favorite outfit, a few simple cleaning steps can remove old stains and prevent many future washing disasters. A bottle of detergent, bleach and a handy stain stick can change the way you think about cleaning your clothes.

Discover the Underground Railroad

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Across from the Kappa Sigma Fraternity on University Avenue a small historical marker stands half covered by the branches of a nearby tree. An old, light green stable surrounded by trees sits several yards away from the hidden marker.

A closer look at the plaque reveals a part of our history that few today are able to believe or understand. The sign reads, "This old stable was a station on the Underground Railroad. Here fugitive slaves were hidden, fed, and aided in reaching the next station on their journey."

Though little historical information is available about when and how the Underground Railroad existed, records indicate that Professor George Ripley Bliss, a Greek scholar and graduate of Madison University, built the house and stable in 1854. According to the memoirs of Bliss' daughter, Lucy, food, blankets and other provisions were smuggled out to the stable nightly for runaway slaves. The railroad is said to have existed sometime between 1855, after the house had been built, and 1863, when the service of hiding runaway slaves was no longer needed.

On Thursday, September 17, the Civil War Round Table and the Union County Historical Society will host speaker Dr. Charles Blockson, an authority on African-American history. The talk will take place in the Lewisburg High School auditorium at 7:30 p.m. The topic is "Above Ground and Underground/ The Underground Rail Road."

Bull Run continues tradition

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you know Bucknell, you know the Bull Run Inn on Market Street. Whether the occasion is a casual dinner date or a Friday night Senior send away, the Bull Run is a long-standing part of the Bucknell tradition. No academic career is complete without at least one visit.

The Bull Run, established in 1968, was originally the Village Steak House and Campus Bowling Lanes. In 1969, under the new management of Russ and Marie Gardner, the bar and restaurant were opened again and renamed the "Bull Run Inn," after the Bull Run Creek. On January 7, 1972, however, a fire destroyed the entire structure. Determined to keep the tradition alive, Gardner and his family reopened the Bull Run Inn, minus the bowling lanes, on April 7, 1973 at its current site.

The general student consensus seems to be that the Bull Run provides an enjoyable atmosphere where one is greatly needed. Because the Bull Run is one of the few watering holes in the area, students enjoy the small, cozy and familiar environment. Pete Jepsen '93 summed up the overall feeling, saying, "It's a friendly place where everyone knows your name." Joe Klein '93 noted that the Bull Run provides a nice escape from campus. "Quite frankly," Klein said, "I feel like part of the Bull Run experience." The Bull Run is also the traditional place for Bucknell students to celebrate their passage into legality. Linda Hollinshead '93 plans to spend her quality time at the Bull Run "even though my birthday is over December break." No one's 21st celebration is complete without at least one round of Bull Run prairie fires, hemorrhaged brains, and smoker's phlegm.

Regardless of the occasion, be it appetizers or an after-dinner drink, sit back, relax, carve your initials in a table for posterity and enjoy Bucknell's very own Bull Run.

Traci Mellinger–The Bucknellian

There's nothing like a visit to the Bull Run Inn to help ease back into an enjoyable life at Bucknell.

Tailback Kevin McElvene '93 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of September 11 following his all-purpose performance in Bucknell's 41-24 victory over Bloomsburg last Saturday.

McElvene rushed for 64 yards on 10 carries and had three receptions for 96 yards and two touchdowns, one of which being an 80-yard reception which served to break the game open. He tallied 196 of the Bison offense's 484 total yards.

McElvene's effort surpassed his 1991 totals in which he rushed for 97 yards on 28 carries.

McElvene is a psychology major and hails from Helmuth, New York.

Safe jogging on public roads urged

Bucknell's Office of Public Safety and the police departments with jurisdiction in this area have been receiving complaints from automobile operators and pedestrians concerning joggers who frequently run along Smoketown Road, Stein Lane and other nearby public roads on or near campus. A problem arises when joggers run two or more abreast on a public highway using part of the road. Automobile operators who approach these joggers must either slow down, stop, or drive in a wide berth around the joggers so as not to strike them. The problem becomes more pronounced when some joggers do not move to the shoulder of the road to allow the automobiles to pass, thus creating a potential hazard. Yielding the right-of-way is not a territorial issue where the game of "chicken" applies. When a jogger does not yield the right-of-way to an automobile, the following can occur: If the automobile slows down or stops, it risks being struck in the rear by an automobile travelling in the same direction; if the automobile attempts to travel around the joggers, it risks being struck by another automobile travelling in the opposite direction toward it. The second action is especially dangerous on hills where visibility is limited.

Public roads are built for the use of licensed motorized vehicles and these pedestrians have the legal right and right-of-way to use these travelways. Pedestrians have the legal right to travel on these roads only on the shoulders and so long as they do not impede traffic. Automobile operators must always observe the safety of pedestrians as long as the pedestrians do not act in such a manner as to create a hazard. When pedestrians fail to yield to automobiles, they create such a hazard. Police department officials have advised me that for safety and liability reasons arising from past incidents, they will begin to issue traffic citations to joggers who fail to yield to automobiles on public roads or who create a traffic hazard while using public roads. I offer a simple solution which should enable us to avoid this action. When a vehicle approaches joggers, they should form a single line, temporarily move to the shoulder of the road, and yield the right-of-way to traffic. This problem is a safety issue. Your cooperation is greatly appreciated and will make for safe jogging and safe driving for everyone. Good running!

Women's soccer storms to 2-0 start

Lisa Gibbons '95 and Kim Fekel '93 shine in victories over St. Bonaventure and UMBC

BY BILL BROWN AND T. K. DRAPER

Bucknell's women's soccer team was victorious in a 3-2 overtime decision last Saturday at St. Bonaventure. Last season's Patriot League Rookie of the Year and second leading scorer in the Patriot League, Lisa Gibbons, led the Bison with two goals. Sophomore forward Sara Patiro tallied the other goal for Bucknell. Patiro trailed only Gibbons in scoring on last year's team. Kimberly Fekel '93 met the challenge presented to her by the serious injury sustained by last year's starting goalkeeper Bridget Collins '94. Since Collins is out indefinitely, Fekel must continue to give the marvelous effort she displayed against St. Bonaventure. She recorded 15 saves.

Last Wednesday, Bucknell hosted the University of Maryland at Baltimore County under pleasant weather conditions. With an unyielding determination and a rapidly escalating confidence level, Bucknell downed UMBC 3-2, handing UMBC its first loss. It was a battle between two young and inexperienced teams. Bucknell has only two seniors and one junior, while UMBC's roster includes three seniors.

Bucknell struck with disarming quickness. The team gained a 2-0 advantage barely eight minutes into the game. Kerry McDonnell '96 posted the first goal unassisted only 44 seconds after the game's start. Following a throw-in, McDonnell drove the ball past UMBC goalkeeper Christy Friedrich from about 15 yards out. Bucknell soccer sensation Lisa Gibbons '95 took a pass from McDonnell and scored the second goal with 37:40 remaining in the half.

With 11:54 left before halftime, Bucknell goalkeeper Fekel made an excellent save to preserve the two-goal cushion Bucknell enjoyed.

Kasy Kruger recorded UMBC's first goal with 8:20 remaining in the half.

With only 43 seconds left in the first half, Gibbons momentarily thrilled the Bison faithful when she evaded a few defenders and made a powerful shot that UMBC goalkeeper Friedrich was unable to touch. UMBC received a lucky break when the shot deflected off the far goal post.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Forward Lisa Gibbons '95 recorded two goals against St. Bonaventure and two against UMBC this past week to lead the Bison to a 2-0 start. Gibbons was last season's rookie of the year in the Patriot League.

Both teams excelled on defense for the first 22 minutes of the second half, and no goals were scored.

With 22:57 left in the game, Gibbons scored her second goal of the game and fourth of the season. With this 15-yard unassisted goal, Bucknell's lead was increased to a more comfortable margin of 3-1.

UMBC was not willing to concede the contest yet, though. Just three minutes later, Fekel made a fabulous diving save of a UMBC shot.

Two minutes later, the clock stopped because of an apparent injury sustained by a UMBC player. The player did leave the field on her own power and, the substitution having been made, play resumed promptly. Rough play was evident throughout the game. Pushing was a frequent occurrence as well as tripping.

With only a two goal deficit to overcome, UMBC's defense played relentlessly in the last 15 minutes of the game. Two examples illustrated this pertinacious team effort. With 12:30 left, a Bucknell player broke away with the ball within twenty yards of the UMBC goal. UMBC defenseman Erin Grossberg hustled and caught the Bucknell player. The Bucknell player's freedom was a transitory delight. Many UMBC players converged on the scene immediately and the assault was thwarted. After a corner kick by Bucknell with 11:45 remaining, more than ten players converged on the loose ball within five yards of the goal. An alert UMBC defender quickly kicked the ball away.

Bucknell has an 18-game schedule this fall with only eight home games. Bucknell head coach Toby Lovecchio was very pleased with the performance of his team in its first two games. He said that his players exuded an air of confidence that was lacking last year. Lovecchio has two reasonable goals for the team, the first being to make the playoffs. In the Patriot League, the top four teams of the six total teams are invited to participate in the post-season competition. Also, he would be content if the Bison finish the season at least .500.

"The team is confident and is having fun," said Lovecchio. He added that the team "has much more depth coming off the bench than last year's team had."

Lady Bison tri-captain Stephanie Porcaro '93 said, "I'm glad we won. UMBC beat us last year 4-2. We worked the ball better this time."

Bucknell's star sophomore forward Gibbons added, "Both St. Bonaventure and UMBC had scholarship players on their teams, but a combination of our recruits and our returning players proved that we had the better team."

Bucknell's next home game is Saturday at 1:00 p.m. against league rival Lehigh. Porcaro says, "We need to keep the momentum going. We really need to win the Lehigh game, the first Patriot League game."

Megan Coyne '95 is concerned about the possible improvement of Lehigh. "Although we beat Lehigh last year, who knows what recruits they have brought in."

Lady Spikers undergo fruitless first week

BY ERIC BIRNBAUM AND LARNIE J. BOOKER

After posting a disappointing 9-23 record during its 1991 campaign, the women's volleyball team hoped to begin this season on a winning note. Unfortunately, that note was a little flat. The Lady Spikers dropped all three of their first round matches in the St. Francis Tournament this past weekend and their Tuesday night match against Delaware en route to compiling an 0-4 record over the first week of action.

Last Saturday, the team travelled to Loretto, Pa. and took on Duquesne, St. Bonaventure and La-Salle in the St. Francis Tourney. The Lady Spikers' first opponent was Duquesne and, after dropping the first game 15-9, the team put together a stronger effort but lost the second game by the narrow margin of 16-14. They subsequently lost the last game 15-5 and, as a result, the match in straight games. The team was unable to maintain a steady offensive attack against the powerful players from Duquesne, who went on to defeat St. Bonaventure in the championship game. Nowhere was this more evident than in the fact that the squad was only able to put away 20 kills in 75 attempts, a meager 27 percent.

Following this turbulent beginning, the team then went on to face St. Bonaventure, against whom they fared slightly better. Behind 19- and 10-kill efforts from captain Sarah Mesaros '93 and hitter Laura Spinney '95, the team was able to launch an apparent comeback by winning the third game 15-10. Unfortunately, their hopes were dashed in the followed game with a 15-4 loss, and the match went to their opponents.

Having lost the first two matches, the team looked to regroup in an attempt to salvage at least one victory against LaSalle. This proved to be its closest match of the young season, yet they were still unable to collect Bucknell's first victory, losing 15-13, 16-14 and 15-9.

The Lady Spikers hoped to turn things around on Tuesday against the Blue Hens of Delaware. The Bison once again challenged their opponent, but lost the match in three straight games, 15-13, 15-2 and 16-14. Despite the close scores, the offense seemed to sputter as it recorded just 26 kills and compiled a 14 percent attack percentage for the three-game match. Bucknell's front line was also unable to stop the front line of Delaware, as the squad registered only 3 blocks for the match.

Although the team is still in search of its first victory of the season, head coach Cindy Opalski remained optimistic afterwards, saying, "We are very young and talented. We are now starting two freshmen, three sophomores and one senior. However, if we stay on track and remain focused we can do some great things this year."

The Lady Spikers will get their next opportunity to do just that tonight and tomorrow as they host the annual Bucknell Invitational. Iona, Fairfield, St. Bonaventure, Cleveland State, St. Francis, St. Peter's and Canisius are the seven opponents scheduled for competition.

Men's soccer season begins with promise

Bison remain undefeated after victories over Pittsburgh and Kutztown; Alex Kogan '94 and Greg Beatty '95 provide offensive thrust

On the sideline at the Bucknell soccer field, midfielder Jon Mackenzie '93 struggles to maintain control of the ball in front of a Kutztown opponent. Mackenzie is a four-year starter for the Bison and one of Bucknell's two captains this season, along with goalkeeper Mark Wrigley '94.

Despite missing several first half scoring opportunities which could have put the game out of reach early, Bucknell's men's team raised its record to 2-0 Wednesday by defeating Kutztown 3-0 in its home opener.

The Bison defensemen were solid throughout the contest, making few mistakes and covering well for one another when a breakdown occurred. Miscues on the defensive side of the ball were ultimately smoothed over by goal keeper Mark Wrigley '94, who recorded his first shut out of the young 1992 season.

Play between the two squads went from one end of the field to the other without a score for the duration of the half, although Bucknell controlled the game offensively for the overwhelming majority of the first 45 minutes. Much of Bucknell's offensive punch was supplied by Rich Shaheen '95, although he did not make it onto the scoreboard. Shaheen played brilliantly at outside right halfback,and it seemed as though every offensive spurt began at the junior's foot.

In spite of the fact that they put tremendous pressure on their opponents in the first half, the Bison remained in a scoreless deadlock with Kutztown for most of the game. Bucknell finally broke out on top near the 80th minute of play when midfielder Jeff Capone '94 played in a great shot just out of the reach of the Kutztown goalie, who, to his credit, had a fine game in the net. Bucknell recorded its second goal a mere three minutes later, this time due to a defensive mistake when the visiting defenders put the ball into their own net. Capone figured into the scoring once again in the 89th minute with an assist for Greg Beatty '95, who played the ball into an empty net amid confusion around Kutztown's goal to finish off the scoring with authority.

The Bison won their first game of the season at Pittsburgh this past weekend by a scoree of 3-2. Scorers for Bucknell included Alex Kogan '94, who kicked in a pair of goals, and Greg Beatty. Next up for the men's squad will be a showdown in the backyard of Patriot League rival Lehigh, who is likely to give the Bison their first true test of the year. Tomorrow's match is set for an 11 a.m. start.

Bucknell's first two showings serve as a building block for the remainder of the team's fall campaign, and if they can improve their offensive build-up from the back, they may stand to get back into the thick of Patriot League competition this year after slogging through a forgettable 6-11 record in 1991.

Bucknell's first win of the 1992 season, a narrow 3-2 decision over Pitt this past Sunday, was powered by two goals by forward Alex Kogan '94. Kogan is seen here in action against Kutztown.

The perfect balance

These days, it is a rare thing indeed when a person can find an institution of higher education that distinguishes itself equally in both athletics and academics.

A look through any Barron's college listing handbook will tell you that U.C.L.A. has a strong tradition of athletic dominance, and that Harvard ranks among the most elite schools in the United States in terms of its scholastic reputation. But exactly where can one find a university that strikes a perfect balance between highly-regarded academics and sports programs alike?

Here's a hint: You're attending one. While no one was watching, Bucknell has quietly established itself as one of the most balanced schools in the nation in these two areas, and this fact is a direct tribute to both the administration and student body of the University. A recent NCAA study found that Bucknell's 94 percent graduation rate for student athletes ranks first among Division I colleges and universities in the United States, with formidable Duke University coming in second with 92 percent. In addition, only Nebraska lays claim to a higher total number of Academic All-Americans in the last ten years.

While Bucknellians are going hard on the field, additionally, they are also pushing themselves in one of the most pressure-filled and rigorous academic programs in America. Nowhere will a person find a Bucknell student-athlete languishing in the curriculum of a bogus major. Anyone who has watched a Big-Ten football game on a given Saturday afternoon knows the whole list of camouflage fields of study for full-time athletes in college: tourism (traveling to away sites for games, see the larger universities in Florida), physical education (practice), and general studies ("general," of course, referring to picking up one major, flopping in it, going to another major, bursting into flames there, and so on). At Bucknell, there is always a bona fide degree to fall back on after the rush of four years of varsity competition has faded away. Sadly, this type of expectation at the University is absent at far too many other institutions across the country. At Bucknell, no students are simply used up for their athletic prowess and left out to dry after graduation with no education to aid them in the job market.

The on-field accomplishments of Bison athletes have been just as impressive. Bucknell has won the President's Cup, awarded to the Patriot League institution with the highest point total (based upon tournament finishes and final regular season standings) over the course of the academic year, for two consecutive years now.

Further, the achievements of Bucknell athletes on a national level are also commendable, considering the relatively small size of our 3,400-student population. The 1991-92 men's cross country team finished 13th in the NCAA championships, while the men's basketball team came within six points of winning a berth in the NCAA national tournament in the Patriot League championship game against Fordham during last year's campaign. Bucknell has come to expect 20-win seasons from the Breakin' Bison, and they have delivered with consistency, often flirting with post-season appearances in the 64-team tourney in the process.

Elsewhere, the women's soccer team qualified for the Patriot League tournament in 1991 despite only being in its second varsity campaign, and set a team record for victories in a season with seven wins. The young Bison surpassed all expectations by finishing fourth in the league, and look to extend their improving play this fall.

Clearly, Bucknell offers America's universities and colleges with a perfect model of what a well-balanced institutition of higher learning should be, right down to the last Academic All-American.

Bison tame Huskies 41-24

Offense explodes on the ground and in the air as Bison win shootout; face powerhouse Villanova tomorrow

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

So long, seven-game losing streak. The Bucknell football team ended its longest win drought since 1953 last Saturday at Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium with a convincing 41-24 victory over Division II Bloomsburg Huskies.

Tailbacks Matt Walsh '93 and Kevin McElvene '93 starred for the revitalized offense, which nearly doubled last year's point total high for a single game (21 points against Fordham in the season's only win). On Bucknell's opening drive— a 16-play, 94-yard effort which took 6:58 off the clock— Walsh carried the ball 10 times for 51 yards. For the day, Walsh got the call 32 times, and ran up 120 yards on the ground— both career highs.

McElvene's coming-out party was equally impressive. He recorded the first two touchdowns of his varsity career, including an 80-yard reception on a screen pass which gave the Bison a 21-7 lead in the second quarter. In all, McElvene rushed for 64 yards on 10 carries, and he snared three passes for 96 yards.

Bucknell head coach Lou Maranzana commented on the running game, "Matt (Walsh) is a seasoned player. Kevin (McElvene) has always had a lot of talent, but this year for the first time he's really locked in to the offense. He's a good complement to Walsh."

Following a heated pre-season battle for the starting quarterback job between sophomores Travis Kopp and Rob Glus, it was Kopp who got the call against the Huskies. In a little over a half, he completed nine of 11 passes for 148 yards and three touchdowns, but a vicious hit early in the second half left Kopp on the sidelines with a concussion. Glus, who started one game last season, stepped right in, completing five of eight tosses for 98 yards and one touchdown.

"I thought they both played well," said Maranzana. "Robbie (Glus) came in and did just what we expected him to do. They are both starter level for us. They can both get better and better and can win for us."

The defense had its good points as well, although the clearly inferior Bloomsburg squad gave the Bison fits now and again. Linebacker Russ Strohecker '95 shined, making nine tackles, including one that resulted in a Bloomsburg safety. Strohecker also picked off a pass and returned it 38 yards for a touchdown that gave the Bison a 28-7 lead late in the first half.

On the down side, Bloomsburg quarterbacks Jeff King and Rich Becker picked apart the Bucknell's secondary for 336 aerial yards and two touchdowns. The Bison could not contain Bloomsburg's huge tight end Mike Meiser, who caught seven balls for 152 yards. Despite spectacular touchdown-saving deflections from cornerback Duane Hart '94 and strong safety Blaine Fawcett '93, the secondary appears to be an early question mark.

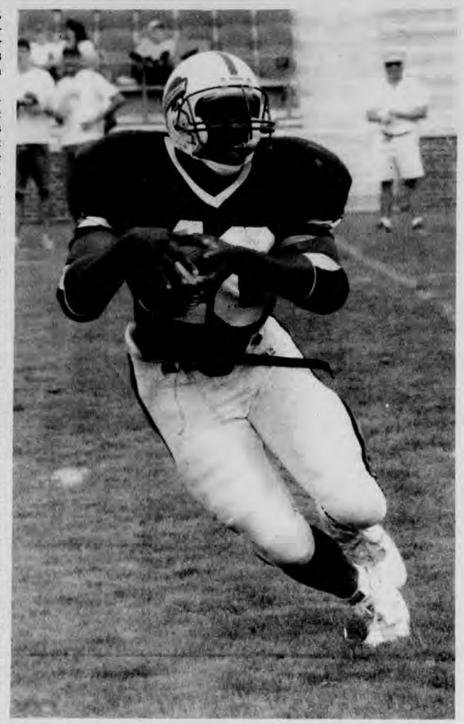
Once again this year, the kicking game is also very suspect. Walk-on placekicker Erik Hacker '95 earned his starting spot with an impressive pre-season, but he failed on three of his six extra point attempts, including two in a row that banged off the left upright.

Next up for the Bison is a trip to Philadelphia to play one of the best Division I-AA teams in the country— Villanova. The Wildcats return almost all of their starters from last year's 10-2 squad that lost a 17-16 heartbreaker to eventual I-AA champion Youngstown State in the playoffs. Last year Villanova thrashed the Bison at Mathewson Stadium, 40-0.

In last year's brutal mismatch, Villanova sacked Kopp eight times in his first collegiate game. The dominant Wildcat defense, which surrendered only 16 rushing yards in Lewisburg last year, will attempt to slow down the Walsh-McElvene tandem tomorrow. Kickoff is scheduled for 1:30 p.m. at Villanova.

Looking ahead, the Bison will be without the talents of Blaine Fawcett for the next six weeks. Fawcett took a helmet to the side of the knee and suffered ligament damage. Despite the concussion he suffered this past weekend, Travis Kopp is expected to be the starting quarterback tomorrow against the Wildcats.

Despite the fact that Bloomsburg represents relatively weak competition, it was still a positive start to the 1992 campaign. "This was a very important game in terms of our confidence," said Maranzana.



Brian Sipes-The Bucknellian
Kevin McElvene '93 helped power the offense over Bloomsburg by rushing for 64 yards on ten carries and by tallying 96 yards on three receptions.

Field Hockey claims OT thriller

Almira Baldwin '94 and Sue Wells '93 team up for game winning goal against Drexel on Tuesday

Susan Naughton
Attacker Elmira Baldwin '94 tied Bucknell's match against Drexel late in regulation time. Bucknell later went on to defeat the Dragons 2-1.

Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell field hockey team began their 1992 season on Tuesday afternoon and their first campaign under head coach Heather Lewis. Taking over the team, which finished 9-9 last year, coach Lewis is "cautiously optimistic" about her first year. "I was very fortunate to have inherited so much experience and talent," said Lewis. "I just walked into a great group of kids."

The Bison roster consists of many returning veterans, including six seniors. Lewis believes that these players will help set the goals of the team for the season — high goals, but not unrealistic ones. "This year's seniors have played in the past for a team that finished below .500," said Lewis, "and last year they led the team to an even .500 season. This year they expect to go above the .500 mark."

On Tuesday, the Lady Bison began the season at home with a 2-1 overtime victory over Drexel University. Bucknell found itself behind after only 48 seconds had elapsed when Drexel scored the first goal of the game. "I didn't feel like we were being pounded," said coach Lewis of the first half, "but we weren't playing up to our potential. By the last ten or twelve minutes [of the game], we picked it up."

The game remained 1-0 in favor of Drexel for the remainder of the first half and well into the second. Bucknell refused to panic, however, and with only 51 seconds remaining in the game, the Bison got a penalty corner. "I've been telling them all season that penalty corners equal scoring opportunities," Lewis said. This opportunity led to a goal by Almira Baldwin '94 off of the assist from Katrina Mueller '93, sending the game into overtime.

The two teams played nearly six minutes of scoreless hockey in overtime before Baldwin brought the ball down the right side of the field and crossed it in front of the goal where Sue Wells '93 tipped it in. "Almira crossed the ball, and there were about four people in there. It was simply a matter of someone getting their stick on it," said Wells.

The victory gave the Bison a 1-0 record and a great emotional start to their season. "Winning the game in overtime was the best thing they could have done in their first game," said coach Lewis. Bucknell travels to New York City this weekend for two games against Hofstra and C.W. Post, before returning to play Ursinus at home Wednesday afternoon.

Committee focuses on reducing barriers

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Alem Asres, Director of the Multicultural Center, will be working closely with members of the Greek community in the hopes of moving toward an understanding and appreciation of all cultures.

BY MICHELLE MANZO

This semester a network of eager students and faculty are coming together to promote a unified campus. Greeks for the Advancement of Multicultural Education, otherwise known as the GAME committee, proposes to launch a series of educational activities aimed to integrate students of diverse cultures.

According to Alem Asres, director of the Multicultural Affairs department on campus, one of the committees goals is to "reduce the existing racial and gender barriers."

Now that the IFC, Panhel and the Multicultural Organization have joined forces, Asres hopes the attempt to unify students of vast cultures will be successful.

"The idea is," says Asres, "to have both members of the Greek community and the rest of the student population work together."

A common misconception is that "multi-cultured" students imply foreign students and minorities exclusively, when actually multi-culture indicates people of all backgrounds and heritage's, minorities and majorities.

Through formal education, GAME's plan is to eliminate cultural misconceptions and unnecessary stereotypes. Asres claims, "We need to know about other cultures and other cultures need to know about ours." In effect, by understanding other heritage's, individuals will in turn "learn to value their own."

Ideally, each sorority and fraternity will be equally represented in GAME as well as the rest of the student population. Students need to "see why it is in their best interest to learn about each other."

This is the first year the GAME will be an active component on Bucknell's campus. There will be at least two major educational functions each semester.

Asres believes that if Bucknell students can individually understand why there is hatred and division amongst cultures, then perhaps this understanding will lead to a common solution. Asres advises students, "You will be tomorrow's leaders and if you don't respect each other here, how can you communicate and become leaders when you leave."

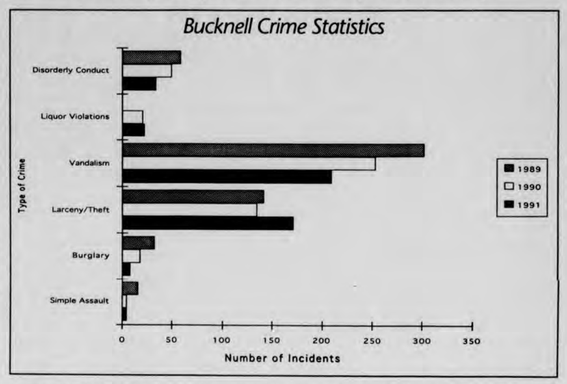
Right-To-Know Act requires Public Safety to report crimes to campus community

BY CATHY DARRUP AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers



The Student Right-To-Know and Campus Security Act, which became effective September 1, requires university public safety offices to report their crime statistics annually to both the campus community and the United States Department of Education.

The process is nothing new to Lewisburg, however; Bucknell as well as all other colleges and universities in Pennsylvania have been reporting this information to the Pennsylvania State Police and the campus community under Pennsylvania Act #73 (the State College and University Security and Information Act) since 1988.

While these regulations do give the Office of Public Safety a legal responsibility to keep the Bucknell community informed of criminal activity on campus, Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio stresses that his office has made this a priority beyond the requirement of the law.

"We want to make sure that students know what is going on around campus," said DeChercio. "We encourage them to be informed."

Toward this end, the Department of Public Safety has responded to criminal disturbances in an open-aired fashion. Criminal offense statistics are available, upon request, to anyone wanting more information about the frequency or distribution of criminal acts on campus since 1989. Statistics are available on incidences of rape, aggravated assault, burglary, drug violations, liquor laws violations and other acts affecting the community.

"All crime incidents reported to Public Safety are recorded as statistics," said DeCerchio. "These statistics and a summary of incidents are made available weekly to the community through The Bucknellian, and are available upon request."

Although the Department of Education only requires a list of a specified crimes, the Bucknell Department of Public Safety releases a complete list of crime statistics, including those not requested by the government.

Nonetheless, despite this concerted effort to release all detailed information regarding campus crimes, discrepancies arise within the statistical procedure when students who are victims of violent acts do not want the incident publicized and therefore do not report it to the proper authorities. A new approach to help alleviate this problem is developing, said DeCerchio.

"The trend now is for the University office that receives information about a crime to give the Department of Public Safety the statistic without the name," said DeCerchio. "This gives a more accurate picture of what happens on campus."

There are instances, however, where, in order to support the victim and safeguard his or her rights, the incident or crime statistic will not be released to the public. For example, if the victim refuses to file a claim with the police or Public Safety and demands complete confidence, the office will file the statistic but no report.

In cases where there is a safety issue involving the victim there may also be no report. In these cas-

Knight fellows present their research

BY DEB MANASSE

Amanda Swarr '93 produced a bibliography of 25 gay and lesbian authors, a course description for a new seminar in gay and lesbian studies, the draft of a co-authored article on appropriate pedagogies for a course on gay and lesbian studies and an independent project on a prominent female author.

Culminating 8-10 weeks of research in the humanities or social sciences, 56 undergraduate students presented posters describing projects sponsored by Bucknell and the Knight Foundation on Wednesday in the Langone Center.

The student researchers were available throughout the day to answer questions regarding their work.

The research was made possible by a fellowship of $250,000 in matching funds provided to Bucknell by the Knight Foundation.

The 56 projects funded by the Foundation represented 55 percent of those submitted and ranged from an examination of the behavior of primates to a study of ancient Roman glass.

According to Douglas Candland, professor of psychology and Chair of the Knight selection committee, years of work by Vice President for Academic Affairs Larry Shinn and Director of Corporate and Foundation Relations Jim Rice, as well as several faculty members were responsible for securing funding for this undergraduate work.

"Bucknell argued that undergraduates could do significant work in the social sciences and humanities," said Candland.

However, according to Candland, because funding is rarely provided for work in these disciplines, "the Knight Foundation is taking a certain risk."

Each participants in the program received a $2,000 fellowship, awarded by a committee of faculty members, for their project.

Applications were submitted jointly by an undergraduate and one of the 32 faculty members who served as mentors for the program.

Steve Baliko '93, an English major who studied Eighteenth Century Gallows narratives with his mentor Anne Badger, assistant professor of English, regards the program as very worthwhile.

"You don't get to work closely with a professor during the school year," said Baliko. "My Knight fellowship project gave me the opportunity to do that."

Other projects displayed in the Cave included a study of personality and environment by Terence Riley '94, Regis Bingham '94, and their mentor Ernest Keen, professor of psychology. The project focused on outside motivational forces usually ignored by the literature.

Both Riley and Bingham feel that their experience with the fellowship program was very positive.

It was a good opportunity to find out whether this is what I want to do
—Regis Bingham '94

"It was a good opportunity to find out whether this is what I want to do," said Bingham. "I discovered that it is."

With its present allotment of funds, the Knight Fellowship program will continure through 1995. After this time, Candland hopes to see the program supported through funding from Bucknell.

Female student physically assaulted over weekend

On Saturday, September 12, at approximately 11:30 p.m., a female student was assaulted while walking alone on campus.

The incident took place on Schwartz Field between the Chi Phi and Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity houses while the student was walking toward Fraternity Road.

A male perpetrator approached the victim and grabbed her from behind. The assailant let go of the victim and ran off when she began to struggle with him. The victim was unable to identify her assailant.

The Office of Public Safety was made aware of the incident through a University staff member who had recieved an anonymous phone call from the victim late Saturday evening. Additional public safety officers were put on patrol to tour campus.

A physical description was provided when the victim came forward and was interviewed by Student Services on Tuesday, September 15.

Public Safety delivered a campus wide bulletin through student mail services on Tuesday afternoon to alert students of possible danger.

The suspect is described as a large white male with a muscular build. His height is between six feet three inches and six feet six inches. He was dressed in a sweatshirt with a hood.

According to Vincent DeCerchio, Director of Public Safety, the incident is "still under investigation." DeCerchio added that "an escort service is available to give rides for safety purposes."

On Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings, Delta Delta Delta sorority sponsors Safe Rides. On all other evenings public safety will provide rides for students who are traveling alone at night.

Any information regarding this incident should be reported to either the East Buffalo Township Police Department or the Office of Public Safety.

University begins search for new art gallery director

By Kristin Klingenberg
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In the midst of the changes accompanying the beginning of the school year, the Center Gallery is adjusting to the departure of its director, Robert Metzger, and looking towards being an interesting and informative resource for the Bucknell community in the future.

Metzger, who had been the Art Gallery Director since 1985, "was, for a wide variety of reasons, looking to move on," according to Larry Shinn, vice president for academic affairs.

Metzger left the University earlier this year to accept the position of Museum Director for the Redding Public Museum.

James Turnure, former professor of art, is curating and overseeing the development of the exhibits this year. Daily operations of the gallery are in the hands of Cindy Peltier.

There have been concerns that the University's art gallery would cease to exist with the departure of Metzger, but Shinn stated, "let me put those fears to rest." Last spring, Shinn appointed an ad hoc committee to explore the directions in which the gallery could go.

The committee, chaired by Marianna Archambault, chair and professor of modern languages, has recommended several ideas for the future of the gallery.

Shinn believes that the gallery has three primary roles: as "an avenue for the expression of good art" for the Bucknell community; as a "teaching gallery," as is expressed in the Center Gallery's charter; and as a collaborator with the art department.

Shinn hopes that the new director will be "a colleague of faculty throughout the campus."

Although separate from the art department, the gallery should provide a means for interaction with both art faculty and students.

On the basis of the committee's recommendations, the main focus will be "to enhance the gallery's teaching role for the campus," according to Shinn.

The gallery will move to be more inclusive of the faculty and their programs, and in turn, the students.

According to Peltier, "part of this vision has come true already." She stated that the gallery "has already been successful in terms of integrating the curriculum" and in addition, "the attendance figures have been up."

John Grim, assistant professor of religion, was involved with the current Native American exhibit, entitled "Skin, Sand, Paint, and Metal: A Visual Exploration of Cross-cultural Encounters in North America." A reception for the show will be held from 4-6 p.m. Sept. 26 and is open to all members of the Bucknell community. Future gallery shows include the Everett L. Warner exhibit later this fall, and "Focus Africa" next semester. Everett Warner's son, Thomas, is a professor of music at Bucknell. Janet MacGaffey, assistant professor of anthropology, will work with the African art exhibit.

Concerning the position of gallery director, Shinn stated that he would like a new director to be in place by next fall.

He will be meeting with the faculty committee on the gallery to review their recommendations and then develop a job description for the position, tailored to meet the committee's suggestions for the future direction of the gallery.

Shinn hopes that the new director will be "a colleague of faculty throughout the campus" and will work with faculty members who would like to integrate gallery exhibits into their classes.

This will hopefully increase the number of students who experience the gallery's exhibits. As Peltier stated, "we want as many students as possible" to enjoy the benefits of the Center Gallery.

es, as well, a statistic may be reported without a name.

"In the case of rape or sexual assault, there are times when there is a delay in the reporting of an incident," said DeCerchio. "This has to do with safeguarding rights of the victim. Some victims won't gave any information unless [the police] vow confidentiality."

However, DeCerchio is adamant about his policy on disseminating information concerning situations that pose a threat to the safety of the University community. "If an incident like this occurs, I will issue a Public Safety alert." said DeCerchio. "I try to get it out in 4 hours. It never takes more than 12 hours. We do a mailbox stuffing and report it to The Bucknellian."

According to a report issued by DeCerchio concerning the new laws, Bucknell's Department of Public Safety consists of twelve trained campus police/security officers who patrol campus on a regular basis, a seven-day-a-week, twenty-four hour emergency dispatch center, a Director, an Assistant Director, a Safety Manager, a Crime Prevention Officer, in addition to approximately 35 full-time and part-time safety and protection support staff.

DeCerchio urges members of the campus community to utilize the crime prevention resources at their disposal. These include emergency telephones, escort service, around the clock emergency dispatch, and twenty-four hour public safety officer coverage.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Wednesday, September 9

Officers responded to Bucknell West at 9:25 p.m. for a student who had been running earlier in the evening and was not feeling very well. The student was transported to Evangelical Hospital by the Student Health Service driver.

Students at parties will be permitted to pick up their cans of beer if they are wearing wristbands indicating they are 21 years of age.

1. All rules of the IFC Risk Management Policy still apply to all fraternity functions, all Panhellenic Risk Management rules still apply for sorority functions, and all university rules apply at all functions.

2. A person may not be waring any wristband of similar nature when entering a party.

3. When a person comes to the door, he/she must present his/her ID. The door monitor then checks to insure both that they were invited and their age.

   a. If the individual is twenty-one or older, a wristband is placed on his/her wrist.

   b.If the individual is not yet twenty-one, he/she continues to the party and does not receive a wristband.

4. To receive a beer, the person must show the wristband to the monitor at the entrance to the segregated serving area, enter, and receive the beer (maximum if one). If the function is BYOB, then the person must also present a punch card to receive a beer.

5. No person may have more than one beer at a time.

6. All under-age persons without wristbands found with alcohol will be charged by the university.

7. All under-age persons with a wristband found with alcohol will be charged by the university and the group sponsoring the party will be charged as well.

8. Public Safety will make random checks of people wearing wristbands to insure that they are of legal age.

9. Consumption of alcohol will be confined to designated party areas as determined by appropriate groups.

Student Alumni Association formed

Group promotes student/alumni relations

By Alisa Bland
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Several Bucknell students, including members of of the Parents' Weekend Committee, Homecoming Weekend, Senior Gift Drive and Phone-a-Thon committees , have joined forces to form an organization known as the Student Alumni Association (SAA).

Modeled after similar organizations at colleges throughout the nation, the SAA will be assisting the University by creating a working relationship between students and alumni.

The SAA's main goals wil be to promote student involvement through services and special events; encourage pride, loyalty, support, and a sense of tradition in both graduates and students; promote an interest and understanding between future students, current students, and alumni; and to prepare current students to serve as future alumni leaders.

Although the association has not yet been officially recognized, the founding members have high hopes for its approval by an alumni council later this month.

President Denis Maguire '93 stated that the idea for the organization originally came from the Alumni Association; the students have expanded the idea into its current form.

Membership in this organization will be available to any student in good academic standing. Applications for membership will be reviewed by the selection committee.

"Right now we're trying to develop a stucture," Maguire said. "It's a slow process, but we see it as having great potential down the road."

tions for the fellowship program from the Alumni House in November. Applications will be due by February 3, 1993.

Applicants are generally expected to work on their projects for an 8-10 week period during the summer months, although some exceptions may be made. Those who apply are not judged by academic standing at Bucknell, but rather by the quality of ideas and evidence of a clearly developed program. With 110 fellowships to be awarded between 1993 and 1994, this non-credit project is an opportunity that should not be missed.

Admissions Office faces new challenges

By David Soll

Like most institutions caught in the current recession, Bucknell has been handcuffed by monetary restrictions. In addition, the Bucknell Admissions Office is also dealing with the changing demographics of the country. Both processes have resulted in changes in the admission process.

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

The ever increasing enrollment of first year studentscauses crowding problems in classrooms across the campus.

As an increasing percentage of students are needing financial aid, Bucknell is able to offer less of it. Financial aid to first-year students, once over $5 million, has declined to this year's total of $3,924,497. Three hundred students were admitted on an admit/deny basis, meaning that they were accepted but not awarded any of the requested financial aid. Tuition also increased this year, from $19,475 per year (inclucing tuition, room, and board) to $20,780. This rate of increase is actually lower in percentage than the increases that occurred at many colleges in Bucknell's general price range.

Lack of sufficient funds for financial aid affects the makeup of the Bucknell student body. Terry Carter, assistant director of admissions, noted that Bucknell lost ten minority students to attrition over the summer because of financial considerations.

Another admissions officer who wished to remain anonymous explained, "In the office we try to bring in more minority students, but out on the campus this effort isn't reflected."

A minority on campus which is growing, however, is the number of students who were admitted from the waiting list. The number of wait list students skyrocketed from 37 in the class of '95 to 160 this year. Mr. Carter sought to dispel the rumor that waiting list students are less capable than the rest of their regular- and early-admission classmates. He spoke of an alumnus, admitted from the waiting list, who graduated from Bucknell with 3.9 GPA and went to Boston College Law School. Still, no studies have been specifically conducted to determine how well waiting list admits perform at Bucknell compared to their peers. The statistics (such as SAT scores) that are available seem, for the most part, to support Carter's assertion.

Admitting more waiting list students is part of a larger trend— the changing demographics of college-age students. Bucknell's frame- of-reference schools such as Colgate and Lehigh are also admitting more waiting list students.

Carter notes, "What you are seeing is a situation where fewer kids are applying to more schools." Colleges are thus forced into admitting students from the waiting list to meet their target number of desired students.

This trend appears likely to continue for the next four or five years. Unfortunately, it looks like the recession might just well do the same.

As a result, Bucknell students should become accustomed to more waiting list students in their classes and shouldn't expect to see a rapid upsurge of minorities on campus. None of this is surprising when one considers that the Admissions Office must react to the outside world.

Can Bucknell afford to be picky?

As the academic quality of the first-year class drops slightly for the third consecutive year, Bucknell administrators must repeatedly ask themselves, "How will these lower standards affect the University's academic reputation?" "What can we do to maintain Bucknell standards for incoming classes?"

In the Class of 1996, 254 students scored less than 500 points on the verbal portion of the SAT. In contrast, only 160 members of the class of 1993 scored below the 500 mark. While students who score lower on the SATs will not necessarily prove to be poorer students, the tests do serve as one of the strongest indicators of student ability.

These test scores are reported nationally in over a dozen college guide books. Will Bucknell begin to look less selective and consequently less academically rigorous because of these lower scores? Is the University becoming a less competitive school?

Perhaps more important, however, is whether or not these lower-scoring and perhaps lesser-prepared students will fare well in the classroom. A gap in the students' learning abilities could lead to hampered classroom discussion and unfocused teaching styles. Professors may have to slow the pace of their classes and retarget the average student, thus leaving the more advanced students bored.

Bucknell does not want to lose even a small portion of the entering class after its first year because of low grades. This statistic can also reflect poorly upon the school's academic reputation. Therefore, an effort must be made to see that all struggling students—in the liberal arts and sciences, engineering, or management—receive the academic help that they require to return to the University.

Fortunately or unfortunately, the first-year class is larger than usual. With 912 first-year students, the Class of 1996 is 17 students above the targeted Bucknell class size.

Essentially, the Admissions Office could have accepted 17 less students. These last students technically should have been the least qualified for admission, and this decision would have kept the admissions standards somewhat higher.

Unfortunately for Bucknell, the qualifed applicant pool is shrinking nationwide. The country is also still experiencing a recession. To those in charge of the University budget, this means that the target class number must be met, or even surpassed.

The 17 "extra" students that were admitted have netted the University a "surplus" of approximately $450,000.

To help those who arrived on campus less prepared, a portion of this money should be used to hire adjunct professors for introductory level classes. This would ensure that class size remains small and that students receive the attention that they need and deserve.

Extra student teaching assistants (TAs) could also be hired. The TAs could serve as tutors. This job would benefit both the TA and those students in need of help, by providing important work experience for one student and needed guidance for the other.

With a dwindling applicant pool and a budget that must be met to support students who are already here, admission standards may have to continue to drop slightly. However, an effort should be made to see that even if a student has lower qualifications upon arrival, he or she does not leave unprepared for life outside of the University, for Bucknell's reputation can be evaluated just as heavily by what it produces as what it takes in.

Alum jailed for protesting

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing from my jail cell at Schuylkill County Prison. I'm reminded of my freshman dorm room in Swartz, so I thought I'd drop a line to my alma mater while I'm back in Pennsylvania.

Along with ninety-five other women and six men, I was arrested for an act of civil disobedience while protesting the pigeon shoot in nearby Hegins, where it has veen the town tradition to shoot five to six thousand live birds in their annual Labor Day shooting contest.

It was a day of contrasts, conflicts and cruelty. My team of activists experienced the dawn in Hegins' gloriously beautiful valley, the hills green and wisped with cloud. We heard the rare sound of a blue heron, and listened as the other birds and bats and animals stirred.

Shooters arrived in the park, and the national anthem strained across the killing field and to the woods where we were hiding. Startled from our resting place by a patrolling Heginite, we dispersed and bedded down in the thorny brush. We could hear the shouts of the shoot supporters and the cheers of the animal rights people as pigeons were periodically released by activists.

We felt the spray of birdshot rain down on us through the leaves, and a wounded bird fluttered nearby. I brought the pigeon to our hiding place and gently held her until, thirty minutes later, she spasmed violently and died. We were filled with sorrow and with rage. I wrapped the body in an American flag and we climbed to face the field. There were injured and dead birds everywhere. The shooting stopped; we yelled "cease fire! Ban the shoot!" and were led away in handcuffs. Behind us, trapper boys ripped the heads off wounded birds and stuffed them in garbage cans. On one side, people were holding banners saying, "Compassion for all creatures." On the other side, people were holding guns.

As our busload of prisoners drove past the shooters, I saw a man carrying his wide-eyed infant son. The father was shouting epithets and holding up the middle finger of his baby's small hand. Again, the sorrow and the rage.

Would this child play in this same park, strewn with years of lead birdshot? Will this child see the contrast between the beauty of the valley, and the horror of the slaughter? Mourn the loss of one small life, or revel in the killing of thousands? Be proud to be an American, or ashamed that some of our traditions still include atrocious acts of cruelty?

As we face our seventh night behind bars, our determination to end such acts of barbarism is undiminished. (I never dreamed I'd be writing such words in 1976!)

Heterosexual student supports FLAG&B

TO THE EDITOR:

I am a member of Friends of Lesbians And Gays And Bisexuals (FLAG&B). I am a heterosexual. This may appear to be a contradiction in terms, thus the reasoning behind my letter. FLAG&B is essentially a politically active group to raise consciousness about lesbians, gays, and bisexuals. Although there are members who are homosexual or bisexual, there are others, who, like myself, are heterosexual. I am not writing this letter to confirm to myself, to FLAG&B members or to other Bucknellians about my sexual preference/orientation. That is not the issue. The issue is homophobia. I wish to share my thoughts about being homophobic, and how I have grown not only to accept, but also support the rights of lesbian/gay/bisexual students. Essentially, we are all the same. We are born, we live, and yes, we do die. Could you imagine if you had to deal with living a lie, with taking a risk in "coming out", with losing a job, friends or family as a result of bearing the truth about a sexual preference/orientation?

For the homosexual and bisexual student who attends Bucknell, FLAG&B is a "safe space". The organization provides a comfort zone for what can be a harsh system, educationally and socially. Ideas can be expressed in an open and accepting environment on how to educate and change homophobic views. FLAG&B is also not a hierarchy. There is not a domineering president, vice-president . . . . . who dictates responsibilities. There is simply someone to look after the funds. A treasurer, of sorts, is a label must be placed upon this individual. Beginning this fall, a lesbian/gay/bisexual/questioning advisor has been hired to begin the process of educational awareness. However, it is not enough.

Upon the graduation of many seniors last Spring, FLAG&B is in danger. Undergraduate students who need the support found within this organization, are anxious for a solution. I am not asking that every Bucknellian comes to the next FLAG&B meeting bringing acceptance and support. I am asking of the institution a new thought process. We all want to change the world, even if in a small way. Homophobia is a social disease. Awareness is a cure. It is called having a heart and having an understanding of the risks, fears, and events that result from being homosexual or bisexual. It is not wrong to feel apprehensive towards the ideas of homosexuality or bisexuality. However, the condemning of this nature, this right of these individuals is wrong, especially if we are ignorant. At least one out of ten people is homosexual and an estimated 20-30% of our population is bisexual. Would you condemn a friend, relative, or a co-worker because of a sexual preference/orientation? What if someone condemned you for being heterosexual? Think about it.

Think of all the anger and frustration you would have because you have been told that your sexual preference/orientation is wrong. That the person you love is wrong. How would you react to this? Apply these emotions to those felt by homosexuals and bisexuals and try to understand what they go through. This is the process of acceptance; it is the process of learning to relate to the feelings of homosexuals and bisexuals. In doing so, a change in our lives, in our world can be made. We can make a difference. There is a cure for homophobia. Don't be afraid to look for it. It is a learning experience. It is a wonderful experience.

A flashback to middle school in college?

One of the things that I see on campus that pisses me off the most is the treatment of other people if they are different. I know a lot of people and I tend to be open minded about relationships. I often find myself eavesdropping on conversations between individuals who suggest that this person is stuck up and that person dresses like a such and such and the list goes on and is rather exhaustive. From an early age I decided a few things about myself. I said, "Self, too many people have different opinions about things and rather than just accept what everybody is telling me, I'm going to make up my mind myself." I always would give people the benefit of the doubt and formulate my own judgements about them. I also tended not to make my judgements of individuals public knowledge. If anyone on this campus goes to a party and just observes the happenings for a while, that person will undoubtedly come to a marker in a conversation where the topic is ragging on another person. I find this to be rather nauseating as I could probably tell the person who is so intent on pointing out the downfalls of others what I see wrong with him or her. I normally resist the urge, but sometimes the urge is too great and I'll tee off on that person for a while. I have found that many of the people who instigate insulting remarks of others tend to be able to dish out a lot more than they can take, so it is particularly delightful to put them on the hot-seat.

But anyway, back to my original intent. I want to point out that I thought that there was some slim chance that all of these infantile games of tooling on a person just because they are different would have ended in middle school. I am not in college at a prestigous university and I see no end in sight. Since I see no end to these childish insult games, the most that I can hope to do is try to get a message across that you do not have to go with the norm and you should formulate judgements on your own.

IFC president responds to Cohen article

TO THE EDITOR:

In last week's issue of The Bucknellian, an article was written about the Greek system and an individual's opinion. As president of the Interfraternity Council, I would like to say that I AGREE with Andrew Cohen, an individual should not be forced to sacrifice his individuality to conform to the wishes of a group. The most sacred thing anyone has is his or her values and beliefs, and these should never be compromised.

It saddens me to read the article and read about these acts and instances that should be in no way part of the Greek system. Andrew, I am sorry that your experience was so negative. However, it is equally important to note the vast number of individuals that have benefitted from their experience as a Greek. From scholarship assistance to leadership opportunities to employment opportunities to life-long friendships, being Greek can provide many benefits. Once again, Andrew was right, these are only possible benefits. If, as an individual, you are unable to utilize the avenues of the Greek system, then you will have wasted your Greek experience.

This is a challenge to all people considering joining a Greek orgainization. Develop yourself as an individual, and then utilize the group to polish and expand your values and beliefs. The activities described in the article are deplorable, and we need you to insure that it never occurs again. It has been said that one person can bring about change and two people, well, they can cause a miracle. Imagine the potential of a group of twenty individuals! We encourage you to join us for the right reasons, and we demand that you maintain yourself as an individual. There can be a bright future for the Greek system, but only if strong-minded and true-hearted men and women join our ranks. Accept the challenge; keep the system strong and value oriented. You can make an impact.

Fire prevention sparks warnings

A few simple cautions could save your life and your belongings

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Extension cords, hot pots, candles, "goose-neck" lamps, toasters and toaster ovens, incense, old, frayed electrical cords, over-stuffed plugs and clip-on lights. Which of these fire hazards are you willing to let destroy your life, your possessions, or your fellow students?

In light of the Tau Kappa Epsilon (TKE) fire two weeks ago, a heightened awareness of fire hazards in dorm rooms has crossed the minds of many a student on campus. The solution? Fire safety. Since first grade, we have been taught to devise a family evacuation plan and meeting place, to feel doors for heat, to crawl on our hands and knees to avoid smoke inhalation and to stop-drop-and-roll. So where do these safety precautions go when we leave home and enter the realm of higher education? Surely, caution is not thrown to the wind when we step into a residential hall.

Are you willing to let these common fire hazards destroy your poseessions?

According to Jim McCormick, the Safety Manager for Bucknell, most fires on campus are caused by carelessness, not arson. "I understand," McCormick said, "that students have more than fire prevention on their minds, but when does safety become the issue? It is all so simple when you consider the alternatives."

McCormick's main concern in fire prevention is the use of extension cords. "Avoid the use of extension cords, if you can," McCormick warned. Misuse of extension cords is a common campus fire hazard. Only one appliance at a time should be plugged into an extension cord. Extension cords should never be run under rugs, across doorways or over nails—the insulation could deteriorate, exposing a live wire.

Some extension cords are made for light duty use only. Special appliances, such as refrigerators, microwaves, or stereo systems, should have their own outlets. The different thicknesses of a cord denote the different gauges of the wires they contain. The higher the gauge (usually printed on the label), McCormick noted, the smaller the wire. If the extension cord is too light for the appliance, the cord and/or the plug will heat up from pulling too much electricity through a cord that is too small. "When the cord heats up, the insulation deteriorates and the heat spreads," McCormick said. "It spreads to curtains, beds, carpets...everything."

Avoiding the use of extension cords, however, is not always easy. If a room is equipped with only four outlets, students often run into the problem of too many plugs and not enough outlets, thus the need for extension cords. To avoid the dangers of extension cords, McCormick recommends the use of power blocks, a strip of six or seven outlets contained on a long electrical block. Power blocks are approximately $10 and allow the safe usage of one outlet to provide electricity for additional outlets. "Plug the power block into the wall," McCormick warned again, "NOT an extension cord!"

McCormick also cited the danger of clip-on or twistable, adjustable lamps, commenting, "Four fires in the last four years have been caused by these lamps." Because the lamps fall over easily, they are prone to start fires from the heat of the bulb. To prevent this disaster, McCormick suggests either not using the lamps or using only the recommended bulb wattage for the lamp. "Follow the recommendations of the manufacturer. If it says use a 40 watt bulb, use a 40 watt bulb," said McCormick.

Other safety measures include turning off appliances when they are not in use, completely extinguishing smoking materials, and abstaining from the use of candles or incense. Common sense can prevent many avoidable accidents.

"Within three minutes, an entire room can be engulfed in flames with a temperature of 1500 degrees," McCormick said. Because of the incredibly short amount of time it takes a fire to spread, the response time for fires must be instantaneous. The fire alarms that are located in many dorm rooms and all buildings increase the speed of response significantly. McCormick noted that each individual smoke and heat detector is hooked into a mass alarm system for the campus.

Any student who has one of the detectors in his/her room may check the status of it by looking for the red blinkng light inside of the detector. If the light blinks, the system is on and operable. The blinking light indicates that the mass system located at Public Safety is checking itself.

The key to fire safety is awareness and common sense. A raging fire does not discriminate. "Fire prevention involves more than just one safe student. It involves students, roommates, hallmantes...everyone," concluded McCormick. A few simple precautionary steps can make the difference of a lifetime.

The Enemy

I am more powerful than the combined armies of the world. I have destroyed more men, women and children than all the wars of all nations. I massacre thousands of people every year. I am more deadly than bullets, and I have wrecked more homes than the mightiest guns.

In the United States alone, I steal over 500 million dollars each year. I spare no one and I find my victims among the rich and poor alike, the young and old, and the strong and the weak. Widows know me to their everlasting sorrow. I loom up in such proportions that I cast my shadow over every field of labor.

I lurk in unseen places and do most of my work silently. You are warned against me, yet you heed me not. I am relentless, merciless and cruel. I am everywhere, in the home, in the schools, in the factory, on land, in the air, and on the sea.

I bring sickness, degradation and death, yet few seek me out to destroy me. I crush, I maim, I devastate—I will give you nothing and rob you of all you have.

I AM YOUR WORST ENEMY—
I AM RAMPANT FIRE.

Make the most of money

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the cost of tuition rises higher and higher by the year, students are beginning to ask themselves, "Is my Bucknell education worth the money?" Faced with this question and the fear that somehow, in the long run, their education will not be complete or lead to a career, students may find themselves in a no-win situation.

Not so, says Maurice F. Aburdene, chairman of the department of electrical engineering. Aburdene, who has taught at Bucknell since 1981, said most freshmen have a hard time adjusting to college because "the level of work is much greater than in high school." According to Aburdene, a few simple hints will help students, especially first-year students, get the most out of their college education. Although the hints are not the cure all for poor grades, Aburdene notes that "they definitely will help you get a better education."

Here are Aburdene's suggestions for students interested in stretching the college fund:

—Read a daily newspaper. You will be able to relate your studies to current events, business and technology.

—Visit each of your professors. Let them know your interests and goals. If your learning goals are ill-defined, the professors can help you formulate them. When research jobs and other opportunities become available, professors will think of you.

—Find a mentor, either a professor or a staff member. Mentors can help students weather the difficult times and provide support and a sympathetic ear.

—Study hard. Expect to spend a minimum of three hours studying for each hour in class.

—Join academic, social and athletic clubs. You can be a doer as well as a spectator. Take advantage of the broad range of cultural and sporting events on campus.

—Take time to eat well.

—Get a job as a research assistant, administrative assistant, paper grader, kitchen helper, or any other campus job. Volunteer if no money is available. Working adds perspective and looks good on your resume.

—Attend workshops to improve writing, computer graphics, music and word processing skills.

—Ask questions in and out of class. Participate in class discussions.

—After every class or reading assignment, ask the following: What was the main purpose of the lecture? What are the important concepts? Why are these concepts important? Which concepts do I need to work on? How and where can I use these concepts?

—Stay away from negative-thinking students and professors. Avoid constant complainers.

—Assign time for relaxation every weekend. However, avoid watching TV sporting events. They take too much time. Watch the highlights instead.

P.S. Zoo clothes Bucknell

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
P.S Zoo offers Bucknellians the collegiate ambiance and the necessary staples in clothing they demand.

If you're a Bucknellian you've been to...

BY KATE FINK

Spying six or seven people wearing "Tommy Hilfiger" oxfords of various colors while walking to class is not an uncommon occurence. Nor is borrowing a friend's cotton "Nautica" sweater when an unexpected chill nips the air. All across campus in the stuffed computer labs sit Bucknellians dressed in polo shirts, every conceivable shade of khaki shorts, braided belts, and leather loafers. Where is this almost unvarying preppy Bucknell look obtained? "It's either J. Crew or P.S. Zoo," states Robin Stutman '93.

P.S. Zoo, in downtown Lewisburg, offers a quick fix for those who are not patient enough to mail order their preppy uniform from J. Crew. The store, featuring Tommy Hilfiger polos, oxfords, light jackets, shorts, pants, and rugby shirts, as well as a large line from Nautica, is a popular stop for Bucknell shoppers.

The initials in the name stand for its origin, Penn State, where the first and only other P.S. Zoo store exists. The store was opened in Lewisburg four years ago because its owners "foresaw demand from Bucknell and the surrounding communities," said Hew Woodward '93, a P.S. Zoo salesperson.

And demand there is. Most of the Bucknell students, men and women, gravitate toward the rustic left side of the store where the men's clothing is located. The wooden floors, college pennants, rowing oars painted in the dressing rooms, and the highlight, a crew boat relic suspended upside down from the ceiling, offer a collegiate, "varsity" atmosphere. People shop for both themselves, especially at the beginning of the school year, and usually around Christmas, for others. "On weekends when there are home football games, we get a lot of traffic because students bring their parents shopping so they can sucker things off of them," observed Woodward. He also notices many couples, strolling through town, coming in to browse the men's section.

The women's section, housed beneath a white "gazebo," offers preppy, "country" clothing under various labels. "The Eagle's Eye," one of the larger lines, offers skirt, cardigan, and turtleneck ensembles. This section caters more to the local residents, who demand more dressy clothing. "Women come here all the way from the Williamsport area because we are known for our large selection of dressy clothes," said Mark Dreistadt, Corporate Assistant at P.S. Zoo.

A new section has been created in the back room of the store, where very expensive coats and dresses were previously sold. "There just wasn't enough demand for that merchandise to make it worthwhile. We added the Esprit section to better meet the needs of students and the community," notes Dreistadt. This new section offers popular casual looks that, according to Woodward, "women just tear apart." The back room also has room for shoes, bags, and ties that are rolled up and displayed in "pigeon holes."

The major student complaint about P.S. Zoo is summed up by Cortney Todd '93, "They're overpriced because they have a monopoly on downtown Lewisburg." Dreistadt disagrees though, "We offer all of our merchandise at the retail prices suggested by its label. We do not mark up, as many department stores do." He added that the Esprit clothing is priced below the suggested retail price, leaving it relatively affordable.

Despite its expense, many Bucknell students are thankful for P.S. Zoo. Its large selection of clothing, umbrellas, belts, watches, scarves, hair bows and hats often come in need. "It's amazing there's a decent store in this town," said Brian Regan '93 happily. "I bought some nice pants there and they tailored them for me." If you have not already jumped on the bandwagon, check out the Zoo, located at 434 Market Street in downtown Lewisburg.

Roughing it in the outback of Alaska

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Living in a tent, foraging for food in the woods, walking miles each day in search of a job and sometimes going without a shower for as long as three weeks doesn't sound much like what many Bucknellians have in mind as an ideal way to spend part of their lives.

But Matt Daumen '94 decided that it would be a "change of pace" to travel to Katchikan, Alaska, and spend most of June and July roughing it in the woods with only a duffel bag filled with some clothes, a few supplies, a sleeping bag and hiking boots. "I had heard that there were a lot of jobs up there for seasonal employees so I decided to go. There's lots of work in the fisheries and tourist industries, but because people don't really travel to Alaska during the rest of the year, they're pretty much limited to the summer," Daumen said.

With a friend, Daumen flew from his home in Buffalo, New York to Seattle, Washington, travelled by bus to Bellingham, Washington, and then arrived in Katchikan after a 36-hour ferry ride on the Alaska Marine Highway. Upon their arrival in Alaska the pair stayed at an American Youth Hostel for a short time, but soon decided to pitch a tent in the woods. "You can really only stay in a Youth Hostel for up to three nights," Daumen noted. "And then we lived in a tent in order to save money. When we got there I looked for jobs in canneries and cold storage facilities but because I needed to return home by the end of July, I wasn't hired." After several weeks of not being able to secure a job, Daumen's friend became discouraged and returned home.

Daumen remained in Alaska, however, still optimistic about the experience. "Eventually I found work in a Chinese restaurant as a prep cook and dishwasher, working 60-70 hour weeks. During whatever free time I had, I was also working for a contractor and helping to restore a historic site. But it was tough for a while. Sometimes I had to walk for a couple of miles to the factories where they might be hiring, only to be told, 'Come back tomorrow.' When you don't have a job it weighs down on you real hard and it's hard not to get frustrated or discouraged. But something that was good about one Seattle news broadcast was that they had a voice mail system which enabled homeless people to receive callbacks from employers if they had no other way of getting information about jobs."

He added, "I found out that it really sucks not to have money. At one point I only had 13 cents which had to last for a couple of weeks. So I foraged for berries and sometimes ate at soup kitchens. Bathing got kind of hard also. Sometimes I snuck in to a public pool and got to use the showers there but otherwise I didn't have an opportunity to get clean."

There were also other important aspects of the experience, for Daumen. Daumen commented, "It was so different to be all alone out in the woods. It was sometimes kind of frightening, like when I was chased by a bear, axnd every now and then it did get kind of depressing. But I spent a lot of my time alone writing and I realized that I could get by."

The location was another integral part of the trip. "Katchikan is technically a rain forest and it's really beautiful. There's all kinds of plant growth and you can see eagles flying above the trees, salmon swimming upstream...In the town there was this one street called Creek Street and all the houses are above the river on pilings and there's sort of a boardwalk with lots of shops and cafés. The area was just so beautiful," Daumen reminisced. "And there is a humongous population of 18-23 year olds who travel to Alaska just to work there for the summer. We all hung out at a community center in the area and got to know each other. Sometimes people found jobs together in the canneries and decided to live together also."

Now that he has had a taste of "real life" as Daumen put it, would he ever repeat the experience? "I plan to do it again. Probably not this coming summer, but definitely after graduation. And I would definitely recommend this kind of an experience to others," advised Daumen. "It was just so valuable and worthwhile."

Follow the townies to the Towne Tavern

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
The newly renovated Towne Tavern on Market Street offers fine food and an atmosphere to match.

BY SCOTT DONALDSON AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

We never used to feel badly about spilling a beer or two on the floor of the Towne Tavern. But now, with its new look and the recent addition of frosted glass behind the bar and mallard ducks sitting atop of the fireplace, we would even take our parents to this local establishment to dine.

Scott and I like this bar which is frequented nightly by the locals. The food is some of the best in Lewisburg for the price. Drinks are inexpensive as well. A pitcher of Genessee, Coors Light, Budweiser, Yuengling, or Rolling Rock costs only $5.

The Teal Room, next door to the bar, looks like a country tavern with its green carpet, painted woodwork, mallard ducks, and checked curtains. The menu resembles that of a bistro, due to its large selection of appetizers, sandwiches, and entrees.

Having visited the Tavern multiple times in the last three weeks, Scott and I have discovered that the best dinners are the homemade crab cakes ($6.75) and the fettucini with alfredo sauce ($5.95). The black diamond steak ($9.95) is also, in Scott's ravenous vocabulary, "top-notch." It is marinated to give it its tender texture and subtly tangy flavor. The stuffed snapper carribean with cheese ($7.95) lacked flavor, though. Luckily for Scott, it came equipped with ample tartar sauce to add something to the otherwise frozen taste. Also we could not find a hint of cheese.

All entrees come with a loaf of bread, baked potato or french fries (skin left on), a salad, and choice of vegetables. Blue cheese lovers like myself will savor the crumbled roquefort on top of their salads, and anyone who has worked in as many restaurants as Scott and I have will appreciate the unscathed loaf of fresh bread and lack of reusable rolls for which smaller restaurants are infamous for.

All the appetizers have tasted outstanding. We recommend the potato skins thickly gooped with chili and jalapeno peppers ($3.75), as well as the chili, clam chowder, and french onion soup, three items ($1 per cup, $2 per bowl) which we try at every restaurant we visit. The chili and clam chowder were thick and the french onion soup zesty.

Dessert at the Tavern (Snicker pie—$1.75) was also satisfying and made our meal complete.

If you are not hungry enough for a full meal, try one of the twentysome sandwiches listed on the back. The fresh fish sandwich ($2.95), which I've tried, is a bargain and does taste fresh, unlike its dinner counterpart.

Next time that you don't feel like cooking or perhaps even have a date, follow the locals. The Towne Tavern's food is affordable and tastes good. The place even sports an atmosphere now.

The Towne Tavern is located at 600 Market Street, Lewisburg. Credit cards are not accepted.

Heeding the call to Bucknell

Former actress brings her energy and enthusiasm to the Chapel

BY CAROLINE STEVENS AND NICOLE PANICO

Each year, Bucknell welcomes many new faces to its academic, athletic, social, and religious community. Among the new first-year students, transfer students, and faculty, Bucknell has also gained a new chaplain.

A former theater major at Vassar College, Reverend Alison Boden is combining her skills as an actress with her graceful intelligence to make her services more interesting, more relevant to contemporary life, and more appealing to the college student.

After graduating from college, Boden started as an off-Broadway actress, appearing in several films and productions. She became involved in social and community services through her work at The Riverside Church in New York City with Reverend Sloan Coffin, and volunteered her time at a hospital in Harlem, working with babies and toddlers infected with the AIDS virus.

These experiences, combined with the influence of Coffin, had a profound effect in increasing her awareness of many of the problems facing today's society. She realized she wanted to do something with her life that would be of "lasting value."

Rev. Boden explains, "Human rights are so important." Consequently, when she attended a religion seminar with a friend, she discovered that religion was the path that would lead her to fulfilling her ideals. Soon after, she enrolled at Seminary Union Theological College in Manhattan. After graduation in 1991, she worked as the chaplain for Union College.

Rev. Boden joined the Bucknell community in early July, and has already grown attached to the campus, as well as to the college and academic atmosphere. In her capacity as the chaplain for Rooke Chapel, her main duties include performing worship services on Sundays. These services are interdenominational Protestant services which have received wide attendance.

However, Bucknell's new chaplain has many other commitments and involvements. Not only is she the faculty advisor of Habitat for Humanity, she also involves herself with counseling, Bible studies, and is currently working to implement a soup kitchen in the Lewisburg community. Her community efforts include starting an "adopt-a-buddy" program with the mentally retarded individuals at nearby Selinsgrove Center who will be soon attending Chapel Services.

The Reverend has planned a variety of activities for this year and the years to come. They include a weekly Chaplain's Tea every Friday from 3-5 p.m. in the Meditation Chapel. These gatherings are open to anyone interested in scintillating conversation. Next month that Rev. Boden will be implementing is the Chapel Film Services. Films will be held every Tuesday in University Theater and will highlight such hits as The Mission, starring Robert DeNiro, and Spike Lee's Do the Right Thing.

Over January the Reverend also hopes to head a trip to southern Mexico and Guatemala to work with the United Nations on repatriating refugees. This is just a taste of the ideas Rev. Boden has scheduled for the Bucknell community. Her arrival on campus has already brought innovative and entertaining ideas to many students, as well as to the Chapel.

Josh Klatt

Reverend Alison Boden is just one of the many new faces joining the campus this year. In charge of running Rooke Chapel, Boden transfers her enthusiasm for her work to the students.

Movie Review

Twin Peaks: Fire Walk with Me smoulders in movie theaters

BY MARC HAIMES
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In Twin Peaks: Fire Walk With Me, David Lynch's pretentious cinematic prequel to his bizarre, cult television series, the director fumbles in his attempts to force artistic credibility into what is little more than an attractive amalgamation of sex, violence, and inspired silliness. As Lynch's visual potpourri of abstract images move from intriguingly quirky to frustratingly self-indulgent, the film displays a disturbingly fundamentalist cohesion: a Jimmy Swaggert sermon at a Pink Floyd Laser Show. Yet, despite its 12th century conceptions of hell and eternal damnation, this abstruse account of the nightmarish six days before Laura Palmer's death gallantly crusades towards unredeeming and most degrading pornography.

The first few minutes of the film (taking place directly outside the gates of Twin Peaks) are indeed its best as Lynch seizes a preliminary sense of logic to offer a number of comically self-aware ironies. In response to a controversial cancellation of the "Twin Peaks" television series, the opening image is of a snowy television set brutally smashed apart by a "blunt" object. Lynch also parodies critical over-analysis in a dead-pan exchange between two FBI G-men (Chris Issaak, Kiefer Sutherland) investigating the murder of drifter, Teresa Banks (Pamela Gidley). After viewing a creepy dance exhibited by a sour-faced show-girl, Isaak and Sutherland resolve that the performer's double stitched pocket symbolizes that important evidence is being concealed. The fact that the girl's hand was crumpled into a fist indicates, of course, that the killer will strike again.

As plot seeps into the pseudo-anachronistic, Washington township of Twin Peaks, camera, characters, and logic all melt into fluid incongruity. A creepy midget (Michael J. Anderson) babbles backwards about "garborzonia" (suffering) and formica tables. A one-armed man rants about a black dog which runs at night. A burly bartender informs cocaine blurred Laura Palmer (Sheryl Lee) that "I am the Great Went." "I am a muffin," she responds. "I am as blank as a fart," he concludes.

If there is a thematic continuity to all the pretentious non sequiturs, it is merely uninventive rhetoric about good and evil, heaven and hell. Something to the effect that all of us are dualities of right and wrong. Our bad side should stay in the shadows of the hellish "Black Lodge" while our good side walks the earth. We must embrace our good side and fight off Bob—the shaggy haired, sex-grunting, chimpanseeque, Satan-guy—if we wish to make it past the pearly gates. In a semi-coherent aside to fans of the TV show who may have been puzzled by angelic Dale Cooper's (Kyle MacLachlan) series-finale conversion to the "dark side," Laura Palmer has a premonition that the "bad" Cooper, will be let loose into Twin Peaks to await another sequel, while the "good" Cooper, gets trapped in the "Black "Lodge." A neat way for a "prequel" to assure its loyal fans of more confusion to come.

Amidst his ecclesiastical onslaught of excommunicative obscurity, Lynch finds time to degrade his actresses (and women in general) on countless levels. Throughout the film, various male authoritarians order quivering females to make coffee, wash their fingernails. scrub the floor, and, of course, remove their clothes. Lynch's rather adolescent paradigm of feminine behavior dictates that most nonmales are either timid, insane, or prostitutes. In keeping with this logic, it seems natural that Laura Palmer, a product of physical abuse, has become a sexually insatiable hooker who sidles over to slacjacked, burly lumberjacks and purrs memorable lines like "So you wanna f the prom queen?"

Copyright 1989 by Warner Brothers

It's been argued that Lynch's cinematic work resembles paintings more closely than movies. Characters, dialogue and visual motifs are splattered on screen like colors to evoke gut reactions and primal emotion. Images of violence, digression, and degradation move past plot, integrating themselves into the nightmarish consistency of our repressed Id. Part nightmare, part wet-dream, Twin Peaks: Fire Walk With Me is still bound to confuse and offend any conscientious attempts to make waking sense of it. Perhaps Lynch's, in his sanctimoniously sexist flirtations with the cinematic dreamworld, fails to realize one thing: nightmares, like the original TV show, are free.

Experience the innovation of Pamela Z

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Wrtier

Opening the 1992-1993 Center Gallery Series will be a woman known simply as Pamela Z. The series, which showcases the works of performance artists and experiemental musicians, has chosen a performer hailed by the Village Voice as, "too funny, inventive, and talented to keep a secret."

Pamela Z's program, Echolocation, utilizes electronics and voice to create delays in her music, which includes spoken words, phrases, and melodic lines. In this manner, Pamela Z is able to act as her own accompaniment.

Also important in Pamela Z's act are the non-verbal aspects of the performance. Movement is an integral part of her experimental art form, as are the "percussion instruments," which have been as varied and unique as slinkies or large wooden sticks. Recognized for her innovative performaning techniques, Nancy Clegg of Westword hailed, "She proves a solo performer with minimal equipment and lots of creativity can still startle and surprise an audience."

Pamela Z's vocal talent is not to be undermined by her experimentation. Her range covers several octaves, and her voice can go from being harsh to operatic. A recording artist as well as a live performer, Pamela Z has performed some of her original pieces and works by other composers. Like most of the artists in the Gallery Series, Pamela Z is considered a performer and composer of new music, although she does not limit herself to this modern genre.

The Gallery Series is partially funded by both Meet the Composer and the Bucknell department of music. Pamela Z will perform Tuesday night at 8 p.m. in the Gallery Theater. Performances are free and open to the public.

Pamela Z (left) offers audiences a wide range of vocal and musical talents in her performances. Appearing as the first guest in the Gallery Series, Pamela Z will be performing Tuesday night at 8 p.m. in the Gallery theater.

Bucknell supports poetry reading to aid homeless

Ashley Chertkof—The Bucknellian

Professor of English Karl Patten, co-editor of the literary magazine West Branch and author of The Impossible Reaches, a book of poetry, will be one of the readers at the "National Reading: Writers Harvest for the Homeless."

BY ARA METJIAN

For the first time in its history, on September 22, Bucknell will host "The National Reading: Writers Harvest for the Homeless." The National Reading began as a local drive by one man to help the homeless. However, it has now been transformed into a nationwide campaign. In over 60 campuses and bookstores throughout the country, more than 200 writers will make their voices heard. They will read their works as a contribution against homelessness and hunger.

The National Reading at Bucknell was organized by Karl Patten and Steve Styers of the Stadler Center for Poetry. This benefit hopes to raise money and community support for the plight of the homeless. They first became aware of "The National Reading" through the efforts and publicity given by the literary community. After receiving information about the reading, they immediately resolved that Bucknell should be one of the Universities to host the Reading, and organized a group to speak.

Presently, Bucknell is one of the 60 host locations participating in a presentation of solidarity and collegiality. For those that will be attending, 12 writers will be reading selections from their own works. The selections, some previously published, some new, range in genre from poetry to fiction. Those who will be reading are: Dorothy Baumwoll, David Brooks, Nick Carbo, Denise Duhamel, Gary Fincke, Laurie Kutchins, Deirdre O'Connor, Karl Patten, Roberta Sims, Steven Styers, Robert Taylor, and John Wheatcroft.

In a recent interview with Karl Patten, Professor of English, he remarked, "I am pleased at the numbers and variety of writers who will read here to benefit the homeless. It shows that poetry is flourishing in the Susquehanna Valley, and it's a honor to be able to share our harvest on the solstice with those less fortuate than ourselves."

"The National Reading" was first conceived by Fredrick Busch, a professor at Colgate University. While he was in town, he observed a homeless man and was compelled to act in a helpful manner. "I saw an old man push a supermarket cart down Route 12, which is also the town's (Hamilton, NY's) main street. He had no place else to go, and what he owned was in the cart and on his mind." Professor Busch organized a reading at Colgate University and raised $600. Now the Reading is a nationwide crusade. The money that was raised from the first National Reading was then given to SOS (Share Our Strength).

Share Our Strength is a Washington D.C. based organization which contributed more than 2.1 million dollars to the homeless last year. It distributed the contributions to food shelters, food banks, nutrition programs, job training, prepared and perishable food programs, and domestics and community development projects throughout the United States and Canada. It began as an organization within the food industry to mobilize its collective resources against hunger. Since then, it has raised over seven and a half million dollars, and of this amount, only four percent is used for administrative purposes. All the proceeds from "The National Reading" will be handed over to Share Our Strength, who will then see to the distribution of the money.

"The National Reading" will be held on the autumnal equinox, September 22, the first day of autumn. This was a deliberate gesture made to coincide with the theme of a "Harvest." The collective talents and ablities will be "harvested" and, in turn, they will help to reap for those who cannot. It will be a collection of talents and ablities gathering resources for the homeless.

For those that are willing to help, "The National Reading: Writers Harvest for the Homeless" will be held on September 22 in Bucknell Hall. The reading will begin at 7:30 p.m., and the minimum suggested donation is $5.00.

Book Review

Middle Passage leads to an enlightening message for all

BY MICHAEL LETTS

The entertaining novel Middle Passage, by Charles Johnson, brings to life the journey of a slave in the mid-1800's. Written with vivid analogies and carefully crafted language, Johnson once again embodies the cliche that, "once you pick it up, you'll find it hard to put down."

The story follows an ex-slave, Rutherford Calhoun, from a small farm in Illinois to the seedy, criminal-infested, big city life of New Orleans. Once there, Calhoun finds that he must rely upon his keen senses and his education, which are good compared to others of his race during that period. Running into trouble and facing a forced marriage, Calhoun catches the first available ride out of New Orleans by way of a slave ship bound for West Africa.

The novel is simply a journal of nine entries kept by Calhoun. These entries detail the horrors of life at sea—food shortages, hurricane-like weather, incessant work, a psychotic captain, and disease-ridden shipmates. Yet Calhoun finds that these are only minor problems compared to the personal confrontation he faces when arriving in Africa and the return trip to New Orleans with his African brothers in shackles.

This relatively short and stimulating novel contains a variety of messages. Johnson's themes range from taking things for granted to the struggle for power within a society. This makes it difficult to find one overriding theme. This also leads to an easy interpretation of the book for some, and a confusing message for others. However, until the reader carefully pulls the various interpretations from the plot, the novel is simply a great sea story. Upon careful introspection though, it becomes obvious that Johnson has written more than just a fiction journey. The novel is well thought out and symbolically written, so that it takes on almost a fairy tale quality. Calhoun becomes an example for the reader of the type of mistakes which can ruin a man's life. But like all fairy tales, Calhoun realizes both his mistakes, and the ones of his peers, and pulls his future from the grips of a vicious world.

Middle Passage is a worthwhile read, not only for the entertainment aspect, but for the educational one as well. Johnson makes it impossible for the reader to come away without inhaling what he has just read, and exhaling newly found thoughts and views.

Duckworth receives national recognition from Rolling Stone

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Professor Duckworth, chair of the department of music, was recently hailed by Rolling Stone magazine as one of the six Master Teachers in America. A composer as well a teacher, Duckworth's piece Southern Harmony has received wide attention both in New York and on campus.

BY KATE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When you think of Bucknell, many images immediately come to mind- the domed "Bio Temple," the Weis Center for the Performing Arts, the outstanding music program... or perhaps you didn't know that the music department here is one marked by versatility, dedication, and talented faculty members. This is a fact which Rolling Stone knew.

The magazine profiled Bucknell's own William Duckworth, professor and chair of the department of music, in the September 17 college issue.

The profile by Dan Zevin focused on innovative music professors across the country who teach more than just the "three B's" of the music world (Bach, Brahms, and Beethoven). Duckworth is one such professor. In his jazz, rock, and avant-garde class, students are exposed to pieces which clearly state that music doesn't have to pass the 100-year-mark to be great. Twentieth-century music and musicians are listened to and discussed. Duckworth, himself an experimental composer, hopes that his class can provide students with an insight to our century that can only be obtained through its music. No prior musical knowledge is necessary to enjoy jazz, rock, and the avant-garde. In fact, the class is closed to music majors.

Duckworth, who has been declared one of the six Master Teachers in America by the College Music Society, also teaches music theory and a composition workshop. Several of his compositions have been recorded under the Lovely Music Ltd. label. Duckworth's choral work Southern Harmony, which was performed in New York and at the Weis Center last February by the Gregg Smith Singers and the Rooke Chapel Choir, will be released by that label later this year.

Thatcher to speak in Philadelphia

Margaret Thatcher, former Prime Minister of Great Britian, is scheduled to be the keynote speaker at the Rosenbluth International's fifth annual "Statements of Success" program. Thatcher's remarks will focus on the relationship between the United States and Great Britian, the outlook on the European community, ass well as immediate issues in the news.

The "Statements of Success" was created by Rosenbluth to offer the community an opportunity to meet and interact with some of the world's finest and most innovative people.

Rosenbluth will also present an International Travel Forum following Lady Thatcher's address. There will be a panel discussion beginning at 11 a.m. and followed by lunch at 12 p.m. and two seminars. The first seminar will discuss global travel information and global technology. The second will address the liberalization of the European airlines, and the European community.

The program will take place at the Wyndham Franklin Plaza in Philidelphia this Tuesday.

Phantom of the Opera revival

A Philadelphia tradition continues on the silver screen for the 21st consecutive year. The 1925 silent horror classic The Phantom of the Opera will be shown in the historic Irvine Auditorium, 34th and Spruce Street, Philadelphia, accompanied by the Curtis Sesqui-Centennial Exposition Organ.

Famous Wanamaker Organist Peter Conte will perform the Danse Macabre by Camille Saint-Saens as a special feature of the Spook Shows. The Curtis Organ's recently restored marimba/xylophone will be heard by the public for the first time in three decades.

There will be two evening shows, at 8 and 10 p.m., both beginning with the traditional spook show. Audience members are encouraged to wear costumes and there will be a costume contest after the 10 p.m. show. Tickets go on sale October 1, and will be available at Annenberg Center Box Office, and the Huston Hall information desk, 3417 Spruce Street, Philadelphia. They will also be available the day of the show one hour before show time. General admission is $5 and all proceeds benefit the Curtis Organ Restoration Society.

Golf looks for consistent play in 1992 campaign

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU

With its first match at the Georgetown Invitational today and Saturday, the Bucknell golf team is looking forward to a successful 1992–'93 campaign.

In his twelfth year as head coach of Bison golf, Tommy Thompson stressed the importance of consistency to the success of this year's squad. "Hopefully the sophomores and freshmen can elevate their game to be more consistent, especially in tournament competition."

Due to NCAA regulations, the team began its fall session of the fall/spring split season on September 7th. Qualifying scores were tallied by a field of 16 candidates, including seven sophomores and six freshmen. Battling recent wet conditions and class conflicts, candidates have submitted numerous nine hole scores, hoping to break into the top six who are traveling down to Georgetown today.

Co-captains David Fries '93 and Doug Dollenberg '94 lead a young but talented squad. Fries, a fourth-year team member, averaged 81 strokes per round last season, while three-year player Dollenberg averaged 79 strokes per round in last season's campaign. Thus far in the pre-season, Dollenberg likes what he has seen. "We have had a lot of qualifying scores to see who makes the trip to Georgetown. We've had some good scores, which is very encouraging. It looks as though some people are ready to step up and contribute significantly."

Coach Thompson looks to Dollenberg and Fries to be the catalysts for this year's team, especially with the loss of Don Hansen '94 to a year of studying abroad in Japan.

The fall season consists primarily of tournament play rather than the dual and tri-meet formats of the spring season. In tournament play, five players from each competing team turn in scores; the best four scores are used to determine the outcome. In addition to the Georgetown Invitational, the Franklin and Marshall Invitational, the Susquehanna Fall Classic, the Gettysburg Invitational, the ECAC Qualifier, and the West Point Tournament (October 3-4) round out the fall schedule.

The Bison golfers will return in the spring, when league competition dominates the schedule. Last season, Bucknell finished fifth in the Patriot league, carrying third place into the third and final round at the league tournament. In assessing this spring's competition, coach Thompson has clear ambitions. "Striving for the top half of the league is our goal," said Thompson of their 1993 schedule. "Army and Navy are going to have the advantage on most of us in the [Patriot] league."

Thompson sees Lehigh, Colgate, and Bucknell as contenders for third, while Fordham, Lafayette, and Holy Cross round out the bottom. All prognostications will be tested at the Patriot League Tournament, which will be played at the Naval Academy in Annapolis, Md. this year.

Coach Thompson stresses "course management" as a key to his squad's success. He emphasizes the importance of consistency, especially where avoiding double and triple bogeys is concerned. The main purpose of the fall season, says Thompson, is to see how the younger golfers perform under the rigors of competition.

In evaluating the Bucknell Country Club, home of Bison golf, coach Thompson is quick to praise the efforts of the greens crew. "We have had a new greens keeper for a few years, now , and the course is in as good a shape as I have seen it."

The biggest adversary on the Bucknell links, as many student hackers may realize, is the trees. Coach Thompson echoes that sentiment, saying that accuracy is a bigger key to low scoring than distance. Thompson also believes that the Bucknell Country Club boasts one of the best courses, if not the best, in the league.

In looking toward the upcoming season, coach Thompson views match consistency as the key to success. "We are hoping to develop consistency this year, in addition to shaving a few strokes off scores in match play."

Direction, provided by co-captains Fries and Dollenberg, as well as Chris Curti '94, will be essential in this year's pursuit of Patriot League glory. Dollenberg summed up his expectations of the new season: "We have a young team and we are looking forward to a good season. We have a handful of sophomores that appear ready. Dave and I have to play well and consistently if we want to take a step up in the league. This is our year to break into the top of the [Patriot] league."

Water polo to depend on youth this fall

BY MATT ZARTMAN

Due to the graduation of five of last year's starters, the 1992 Bucknell waterpolo season was supposed to be a rebuilding period. However, a pre-season scrimmage against last year's East champion, Slippery Rock University, showed that the eleven freshman players on the team are both willing and able to fill in some of the holes left by last year's seniors.

"This is probably the best freshman class that we've ever had at Bucknell," said first year coach and 1991 Bucknell graduate John Zeigler. He went on to say that "This year's freshmen hopefully won't play like freshmen. Most of them just need some experience, because they already have the ability that they need to play at this level." Coach Zeigler also added that it was "surprising that we played so well against Slippery Rock, because it was the first time that they had really played together."

The team's other pre-season match was against Princeton. Although they were beaten handily, Zeigler was not disappointed, because it was the team's first time playing in a regulation depth pool this season.

Tim Nesvig '96 is the only freshman that is on the starting seven, but there are five other freshmen who will come off the bench and play just a much as the starters. These freshman players include Sloan Broderick '96, Matt Vacarro ''96, Chris Springer ''96, and Todd Vacarro ''96.

The team will not completely base its hopes on freshmen this season, however, because it has several other key returning players who will lead the Bison. Co-captain Steve Benson '93 is playing his fifth season for the Bison this year. This will be Benson's first year as a starter, and because of his experience he will be looked to for leadership throughout the season.

The other captain is Chris Retzler '93, who was one of the team's leading scorers in '91, and will once again be looked to for offensive production. Another starter who is known for his scoring is Sean Tierney, '95. Tierney started his freshman year for Bucknell, and will be a valuable member of the team again this fall.

Rupert deVink '94 will be starting for the first time in goal this season after the graduation of last year's goalie, John Bradberry. According to Zeigler, the junior "has done a good job replacing him [Bradberry]."

Despite the relative youth of his team, Zeigler is very optimistic about the season. "I think that we'll be the kind of team that will surprise a lot of people in the end, because most of the other teams don't know what we have." The Bison will have to depend on their speed and quickness rather than the type of power game that they played last year.

The Bucknell waterpolo squad usually does not schedule many home dates because of the shallow pool that it uses, but this year one its most important tournaments, the MAC Tournament, will be played in Lewisburg. This tournament will feature Bucknell's strongest opponents, and Zeigler says that the Bison are going to be "right in there with the rest of the competition" in the tournament and throughout the season.

Tomorrow and Sunday, the team will be playing away at the EWPL Games, which is hosted by Army.

With 34:40 left in the second half, Mizoras made an exceptional save on a shot by Bucknell's Megan Coyne '95.

A minute later, Bucknell scored what appeared to be its first goal. Bucknell midfielder Jessica Wright '95 made a perfect corner kick to Gibbons, who headed the ball into the net. The referee dismissed this apparent goal, however, because Gibbons supposedly used her hand.

With 24:56 left in the game, Bucknell forward Patiro shot from 15 yards out on the left side following a series of brilliant passes. Only a fabulous effort by Mizoras prevented this from being Bucknell's first goal, as she caught the ball high above her head.

Five minutes later, a good pass from Bucknell defender Jennifer Hay '96 to Patiro near the goal was intercepted at the last moment by Lehigh defender Shannon Herchel. Lehigh then tried to extend its lead to 3-0, but Johnson's powerful kick from 20 yards directly in front of the goal sailed high over the net.

Bucknell's final threat was posed by Kerry McDonnell '96 with only 3:15 remaining in the game. Her shot off of a penalty kick struck the left goal post.

Obviously discontent with the road defeat, Bucknell head coach Toby Lovecchio chastised his team following the loss. "We didn't play as hard as Lehigh did. You can't just come out to every game expecting to win. Today, Lehigh was the better team."

Last night, the Lady Bison regrouped on the road against Mt. St. Mary's to record a resounding 12-0 thrashing. Bucknell got all the points it needed after just over nine minutes had elapsed as Gibbons scored on a pass from Jen Giordano '95. Gibbons went on to score three goals and passed off one assist, while goalie Kim Fekel '93 was credited with the team's first shutout of the season.

Bison gymnasts jump into something new

BY KELLY PEET

This fall, Bucknell's best kept secret—its gymnastics club—begins its third year at the University. Pioneered by its coach, Dave Lien, the club has a reputation of being one of the most fulfilling organizations on campus. Students of all skill levels, both men and women alike, are invited to join this recreational group.

"I was running around the track and saw [the club] practicing," said Christine Segal '93, who joined in her sophomore year. A former gymnast for six years who cut her career short at the age of thirteen, Segal has enjoyed her membership in the club. She especially likes the low pressure of the organization and the thrill that it provides for her.

During the sessions, members have access to the single bar, which is usually practiced on Sundays, and to the rest of a full gym including a vault and balance beam. The tumbling track, however, is the favorite among the club members. Essentially a long trampoline, the track is a piece of new equipment purchased with money from fundraisers and dues. Raising the money is a small price to pay for its benefits, according to club members.

Lien, who is also an associate professor of astrology and physics at the University, has been associated with the sport for twenty-two years. He competed at the collegiate level at the University of Wisconsin at Madison before coaching for Michigan State University, Kansas State University, Northern Arizona University, and the University of Illinois. As the team's main advisor, Lien teaches beginners the basics of the sport and helps with spotting. "People look at gymnasts and think, 'I'd break my neck if I did that.' Done correctly, gymnastics is actually a safe and fun sport," says Lien.

He has reason to be proud of his safety record. In all his years as a coach and advisor, his gymnasts have never suffered any major injuries such as broken bones. "Strength, flexibility, and body awareness can all be enhanced through gymnastics, no matter the level," Lien adds.

Tara Gesseck '93, the club's president, will lead the gymnasts in many activities this year. The club does not enter into competitions with other teams, but the members do travel to Penn State to see gymnastics meets from time to time. Gesseck says that the club hopes to do clinics for fundraisers and an exhibition during Spring Weekend this year.

Picnics, field trips, and equipment are funded by dues, which are ten dollars per semester. One activity the club participated in this summer was a gymnastics camp at Woolward, which was seen as an enjoyable and educational experience by each the gymnasts.

For those interested in joining the gymnastics club, practice is held every Monday, Wednesday, and Thursday from 7 to 8 p.m., and on Sundays from 2 to 7 p.m. in the fieldhouse by the track. The ten-dollar dues are payable upon the first practice.

while competition showed up. Lots of them. And they looked angry.

Well, our little scrimmage stopped abruptly amidst cries from these fellows that we were backing out of the real game, and that we were afraid of actually having to earn a win. In short, your basic masculine confrontation. They might have even called us sissies, although my memory fails me at this juncture.

Eventually they got their wish and, after a long, punishing match, we fell in overtime 2-1. Oh, sure, we may have been sissies, but we were sissies with pride, darn it!

This particular outing not withstanding, however, by far the most endearing trait of intramural play is that you can usually see a friend across the field from you—and that is what makes the handshake line-up at game's end count for something more than just a simple athletic convention. Plus, you can talk trash with your buddies later that night at dinner if you beat the stuffing out of them during the game, so, that's good too.

Dominating play yields mixed results for field hockey

BY SCOTT GRISIN

Sometimes, domination does not necessarily lead to victory. The Bucknell field hockey team emerged from this past weekend with a 2-1 overall record and feelings that it should have reaped better results from its efforts. After opening their season with an overtime win over Drexel last week, the Bison traveled to Long Island for games against Hofstra and C.W. Post.

"We played well, but we just couldn't get the ball in the net"
—Goalie Danielle Ward '93

This past Saturday the Bison lost 2-1 to a very aggressive Hofstra team on the artificial turf of Hofstra's home field. "Playing on turf is much more of a control game," said Almira Baldwin '94. "We practiced indoors to get ready for the game, but it wasn't as realistic [as turf]." Bucknell's inexperience on the artificial surface showed early as Hofstra got on the board first. "We didn't play a very good game in the first half," said Baldwin. After being outplayed for this period, though, the rest of the weekend belonged to Bucknell. Once they got used to the field surface, the Bison took control in the initial game and outshot Hofstra 37 to 16, but they had trouble converting these shots into goals. "We played well, but we just couldn't get the ball in the net," said goalie Danielle Ward '93. Bucknell's only goal came five minutes into the second half when Almira Baldwin tapped in a cross by Stephanie Carfley '93 from the right side, tying the game at one. The score remained 1-1 into a second sudden-death overtime, until a Hofstra breakaway resulted in the game-winning goal.

The tough loss on Saturday left the team wanting to get a win out of the weekend, and it was mentally focused for the next game on Sunday. For this game, the Bison thankfully returned to a more familiar playing surface at C.W. Post—grass. There they continued to dominate, and came away with a solid 2-0 victory. "I only had to make two saves," said Ward, after Bucknell held the Pioneers to only a pair shots on goal. Baldwin continued her success as she assisted both of Bucknell's goals. In the first half, she crossed the ball from the right side to Sue Wells '93 for the first goal of the game. Baldwin then added another assist to her stats off of a corner in the second half. The ball came to Baldwin at the top of the circle, and she drove a shot toward the goal which Stephanie Carfley tipped in.

The Bison will get their first taste of league action tomorrow when they will be in Massachusetts for two games against Holy Cross and UMass.

JV Bison football runs wild against Crusaders 34-14

BY PETER A. LALOS AND LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writers

It was Monday Night Football at its finest at Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium as the JV Bison football team posted its first victory of the season with a 34-14 bludgeoning of the Susquehanna Crusaders.

Bucknell opened the game with an ill-fated first possession that ended with a fumble in its own territory that was rsnatched up by the visitors. The turnover led to Susquehanna's only lead of the game, as running back Derek Davis scored on a one-yard run. The extra point was blocked, however, and the visitors lead remained at 6-0 with 8:28 left in the first quarter.

With the Bison offense still trying to get off the ground over the course of four scoreless posessions, the remainer of the quarter was highlighted by Bucknell's defense, which stiffened up its play noticeably after the Crusaders' initial touchdown.

The opening of the second quarter saw the two teams exchange turnovers before Bucknell finally overcame its blocking difficulties to take the lead after an eight-play scoring drive. The Bison strode 41 yards downfield and scored on a 36-yard touchdown strike down the middle from Peter Harteveld '96 to John Sakowski '96 on a third down-and-30 play from scrimmage. The extra point by Erik Stieler '96 caromed through off of the right upright to give the home team a 7-6 advantage that it would never relinquish.

After holding Susquehanna to a three-and-out series, Bucknell hit the motherlode once more when Darren Bloch '96 topped off an eight play, 59-yard drive with a nine-yard run. The drive was kept alive by a 20-yard scramble on a fourth-and-one play by Harteveld, who finished the game ten for sixteen for 144 yards, two touchdowns and one interception along with 41 yards rushing on three carries. The margin between the two teams stood at 14-6 in favor of Bucknell.

After another fruitless three-down series courtesy of the home defense, the Crusaders punted the ball back to the Bison. The offense struck quickly, marching 54 yards on five plays and scoring on a dazzling 29-yard run off of the right side by Steve McHugh '95. This stretched the Bison lead to 21-6, an advantage which they maintained going into halftime.

Bucknell's defense came out with equal intensity in the third period and saw to it that any Susquehanna hopes of beginning a comeback were promptly squelched. Sacks by Edward Burman '96, his second of the game, and Rob Bird '96 forced the Crusaders to punt the ball back into the hands of the Bison offense. Bucknell wasted little time in taking advantage of this opportunity as Harteveld patiently engineered a 10-play, 70 -yard drive which ended with a 19-yard touchdown run by Pete Gorski '96 (113 yards on 20 carries). The extra point bloated the home squad's lead out to 28-6.

The defense seemed to show signs of fatigue as Susquehanna then held the ball for a four minute, 51-yard drive and eventually scored on a seven yard pass from Jamie Ott to Matt Plessinger. Facing a 16-point deficit, the visiting squad went for the two-point conversion and got it on a pass to Brian Young from Plessinger with 2:36 left on the clock in the third stanza, cutting the Bison lead to 28-14.

The Bison then chewed up just under five minutes of the clock while taking the ball 69 yards on 13 plays. Unfortunately, Bucknell was unable to put points on the board as the Crusader defense tightened up, denying the Bison running game on a fourth and one play. Susquehanna showed signs of life scant minutes later when they connected on a 37-yard pass play which put them on the Bison ten yard line. A touchdown here would have pulled the Crusaders within 28-21, but a crucial offensive holding penalty negated the gain, and the visitors were forced to kick the ball away soon after strong safety Tad Doyle '96 sacked Plessinger.

The offense took over on the Susquhanna 45-yard line and salted the match away five plays later on a 36-yard air strike to Matt Curran '96 from Harteveld. The extra point fluttered wide of its mark, and the Blue and Orange reached the final score with a 34-14 lead. Susquehanna's next possession was rudely interrupted when Bob Brown '96 intercepted a pass from Plessinger with 6:32 remaining in the game.

The final two Bison possessions were led by quarterback Andy Amrhein '94, who threw for 39 yards on two completions.

'93. With five receptions for 48 yards, Jay Cardinelli eclipsed the 1,000-yard mark for his career, placing him tenth on the all-time Bucknell receiving list.

Unfortunately, Bucknell could not avoid the injury bug. The most serious was wide receiver/kickoff returner Troy White '95, who suffered serious ligament damage to his knee and may be out for the year. Linebacker Todd Hardy '94 also injured his knee and will be out indefinitely. Tight end Joe Zabielski '95 aggravated an old shoulder injury and will likely miss tomorrow's game.

Tomorrow the Bison will travel to the Baltimore to renew their rivalry with Towson State, who is 0-1 after last week's 36-19 loss to Rhode Island. In a rare 7 p.m. start, Bucknell will attempt to get back on the winning side against a Towson State team that came very close to not existing. After the sport of football had actually been dropped at Towson, it was only some eleventh hour compromises, including the loss of scholarships, that saved the program. Once a Division II force, the Tigers have suffered some lean years after their ill-fated move to Division I-AA in 1987. After last year's 1-10 campaign, Towson State sports a lowly 14-39 record in I-AA.

In the last meeting between the two teams, the Bison posted a 55-26 win in Lewisburg in 1990. Bucknell has never won in Towson's Minnegan Stadium, however.

Towson State's talented quarterback-receiver combo of Dan Crowley and Kevin Howard will attempt to exploit Bucknell's shaky pass defense. The Bison will also look to do a better job of stopping the run, especially running back Tony Vinson, a 221-pound transfer from Purdue.

After what could potentially be a high-scoring affair tomorrow evening, the Bison will return home to prepare for its Homecoming game against Brown on Sept. 26.

Women's tennis leaps out to 3-0 start

BY DAN TARDITI

The Bucknell women's tennis team concluded its first week of the season this past weekend with a perfect 3-0 record after home defeats of Army, Fordham, and Bloomsburg.

The year opened on a positive note on Saturday against Army, who went down to the Bison 8-1. The team has to consider the win to be a sweet bit of revenge, as the Cadets were the only club to beat them during last year's 16-1 season. "This was a big win for us," said Erika Anhood '96, in summing up Bucknell's first conquest. "We hope, with a little luck, to win our conference."

Number one seed Julia Diaz '95 won 6-4, 6-1 over Army's Allyson Tole. Diaz, who was one of six players to earn a letter from last year's team, won all of her matches in Patriot League play in 1991. Other match winners on Saturday were Kristina Lutter '95, 6-1, 6-2, over Rebecca Marier; team captain Kymm Carlson '94, 6-2, 6-3, over Hannah Chang; Sara Allen '96, 6-4, 7-5, over Kristen Catron; and Anhood, who rallied from behind to take the last two sets, 3-6, 6-2, 6-0, over Sara Snyder. The team snared two of three victories in the doubles matches, including wins by Diaz and Carlson, 7-5, 6-4, and Lutter and Christine McMillan '95 in three games, 4-6, 6-4, 6-4.

On Sunday, the women's team stifled Fordham in similar fashion, 8-1. Lauren Weihl '96 rallied dramatically from her loss the day before to dominate her opponent on no uncertain terms, 6-0, 6-0. Other winners included Diaz, 6-4, 3-6, 6-4; Lutter, 6-2, 7-5; Allen, 6-2, 6-0; and Anhood, 6-3, 6-1.

Two days later, Bloomsburg was unfortunate enough to get in the way of the Bison and was run over by the score of 9-0. The lopsided nature of the meeting in Lewisburg was probably best defined by the fact that all but one of the home team's players won their matches in straight sets.

Most notable among the triumphs were Julia Diaz's defeat of Patricia Sweeney after trailing early, 4-6, 6-0, 6-1, and Lutter's flawless 6-0, 6-0 thrashing of the competition. The remainder of the wins were supplied by Carlson, 7-5, 6-3; Weihl, 6-1, 6-1; Allen, 6-0, 6-4; and Jennifer Markewich '95, 6-2, 6-0. The doubles teams were just as dominating, with victories coming from Lutter and McMillan, 6-3, 7-5; Ashley Crary '95 and Markewich, 6-2, 6-2; and the freshman pair of Anhood and Adina Junge '96, 6-1, 6-2. Coach Rose Ewan's freshman contingent has now won an impressive18 consecutive matches.

This weekend the team will travel to Lafayette for a 1 p.m. meeting, and then face off against a tough Lehigh club at 11 a.m on Sunday.

Julie Diaz '95 is seen above unleashing a serve in one of her three matches last week. She helped lead the Bison to an undefeated first week.

X-country paced by high expectations

Men and women runners open strongly in New York to start off 1992 campaigns

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This fall's cross country season began in Van Cortlandt Park, NY last weekend as the men competed against Rutgers and Manhattan. The women at the same site faced off against UConn and George Mason. This commentary suggests the potential of the season.

MEN'S CROSS COUNTRY

For the first time since the Patriot League's inception, Bucknell's opponents refuse to concede the men's cross country crown to the Bison, who graduated their top five runners from last year's nationally ranked squad. Are death and taxes all that we can rely on now?

Don't worry. According to head coach Art Gulden, this is a "good team with the potential to be very good." The harriers return two members of last year's top seven in captains Judd Jarden '93 and Tom Eagleson '93, as well as a solid nucleus that includes fellow captain John Lewis '93, Michael Bronson '93, David Slupe '93, Jeremy Hirneisen '93, and several talented underclassmen.

"The seniors have all done the work and are physically ready," said Gulden. "They just have to stay focused and develop mentally to accept the challenge of defending our league title."

Who actually thinks that they're capable of dethroning Bucknell? For one, Lehigh's "aggressive" head coach has been quoted as saying, "Bucknell's dynasty is over! Lehigh's starts this year!" Granted, the Engineers improved and the Bison have graduated some of the school's best runners, but give me a break. I don't buy it, but hopefully this kind of Don King promotion/trash talking will escalate between now and when the Patriot League Championship meet on Halloween day in Van Cortlandt Park.

> "Bucknell's dynasty is over! Lehigh's starts this year!"
> —Lehigh men's head coach John Covert

Speaking of Van Cortlandt Park, the team journeyed there last weekend for its opening meet of the season against Rutgers and Manhattan. Jarden and Steve Clarke '95 tied for top honors while Bronson, Hirneisen, and Eitan Tabak '94 rounded out the sweep of the first five finishes to embarrass Gulden's alma mater as well as the Jaspers by identical 15–50 scores. Eagleson didn't run due to sickness, but is expected to be healthy for Bucknell's next meet. Despite the positive results, Gulden was quick to point out the fact that the competition was weak and failed to truly motivate anyone, thus producing a "jog in the park" type of performance for the Bison.

"The seniors didn't perform the way they're capable of, but our younger runners ran very well," summed up Gulden. "The meet was good in the sense that it enabled us to get some experience under our belts, but we're capable of more."

The Bison have just over a week to get on track before they have to face a tough University of Pittsburgh squad at home on Sept. 26.

WOMEN'S CROSS COUNTRY

Things are looking brighter this go-around for the 1992 lady runners. "For the first time in a few years, our women's cross country team can legitimately consider themselves one of the favorites to win the Patriot League title," said head coach Art Gulden.

Despite only having two seniors on the roster, captain Kristen Opdyke '93 and Gina Abraham '93, Gulden cites the group's attitude as his main reason for calling them contenders. "They're aggressive and confident," he said. "This group is extremely team-oriented."

The race for top honors in the league should be the closest in the league's short history. Holy Cross, Fordham, and Lehigh are expected to join the Bison in the lead pack, and Gulden even went so far as to predict that the four teams would finish within ten points of each other at the championships on October 31.

The team got a head start on the competition by traveling to New York's Van Cortlandt Park, site of the 1992 league championships, for its first meet of the season against George Mason and Connecticut last Saturday. Opdyke led the Bison with a third place finish, Kathy Wurster '94 placed seventh, and Jessica Wilhelm '95 tenth. A sore foot prevented Abraham from competing in the race, but shouldn't cause her to miss the team's next meet. Megan Idell '95 captured 12th, sandwiched between freshmen Bridgette Mayer '96 and Nicole Kropp '96. Overall, Bucknell split with its two opponents, beating George Mason 24-35 and falling to UConn 18-43.

With the graduation of the dominant top five runners from last year's men's team and the shot at a title of their own, Gulden believes that the women's squad may finally have "its own identity." The University of Pittsburgh is next up for the Bison, one week from tomorrow, and should provide a good test for the young team.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Before a throng of 67,000 screaming Bucknellians at Mod field #2 on Thursday, the Theta Chi C team battled to a scoreless tie with Team EX-MAS, 0-0. In what was described as "a ghastly stretcher match" by former sports analyst and fallen angel Jimmy "The Greek" Snyder, the game did not enter into overtime to the chagrin of the assembled fans. Surprisingly enough, few injuries were reported by team officials, although there were many close calls involving players chasing errantly-kicked balls over Route 15. Here, Theta Chi goalie Todd Bianchine '93 stretches out to deny a high shot in the net.

Volleyball captures first victories of the season

Lady Spikers (2-7) finish fourth in Bucknell Invitational tournament but play poorly and succumb to heavy underdog Lock Haven last night

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After being spiked last week by its opponents, the women's volleyball team returned home to host its annual Bucknell Invitational tournament last weekend and Lock Haven on Thursday night. The home court seemed to benefit the team in the tourney, as it compiled a 2-2 record and a fourth place finish. However, on Thursday night, the team lost its match in three straight games to Lock Haven.

The Lady Spikers (2-7) looked to their wealth of young talent in hopes of collecting their first victories of the infant 1992 campaign.

> "I really felt like we were the better team, yet they [Lock Haven] worked hard and got the job done. I think that they wanted it [the game] more."
> —Head coach Cindy Opalski

The first chance arose against St. Peter's, a team that head coach Cindy Opalski described as a tough opponent. The Lady Spikers came out with intensity and dominated the first game of the match behind the strong hitting of Laura Spinney '95, who recorded ten kills and five digs in the four-game match. The defensive effort was led by Amy Miller '95 and Sloan Fleckman '96, who tallied 10 and 7-dig efforts, respectively.

The second game went to the visitors 15-6. Coach Opalski felt that the problem in this game was passing. "We had difficulty getting the ball to our setter Brenda [Hayduk] which in turn caused a lot of missed hits," says Opalski. The third and fourth games saw resurgence by the team. The women regained control of the match and dominated the last two games, 15-7 and 15-11, en route to their first victory of the season.

The home squad's next opponent was Canisius, and a victory in this match would have sent the Lady Spikers to the championship round. With Cleveland State, last year's second-place finishers, awaiting its opponent, Bucknell battled against "a much improved team from Canisius that is probably playing at the top of its game," according to Opalski.

The team soon found itself embroiled in a grueling five-game match. The first game was a nail-biter in which the Lady Spikers outlasted the opposing squad 16-14. Canisius returned to put Bucknell's back up against the wall, yet the white flag of surrender remained unseen from the Bison. The home team began to come back as the hitters smashed the ball past the blocks and diving defensive players from Canisius. Katie Steele '96, one of Bucknell's two All-Tournament selections, led the charge with 10 kills and four blocks for the match. Sarah Mesaros '93 and Aubrey Schneggenburger '95 illustrated Bucknell's talent by recording nine kills apiece along with 25 digs between them. Miller was once again a mainstay in the defense, digging 14 balls. With the match tied two apiece and the championship game waiting in the balance, the two teams dueled in the last and deciding game. With the rally scoring system in effect (in which a team scores on every ball out), the Lady Spikers were unable to pull out the come-from-behind victory, losing a heartbreaking 16–14 game and hence the match. Despite the loss, Opalski says, "the team played really well. We are a young team of mostly freshmen and sophomores. And for our team to play as well as we did and make as few mistakes as we did, I'm really excited about that."

The 1-1 record after the first day positioned the team second in their pool, which allowed it to play in the match that decided third place. This meeting was against their old nemesis St. Bonaventure, a team that totally dominated the Lady Spikers last weekend in Loretto, Pa. in the St. Francis Tournament. The women hoped to avenge their loss. Unfortunately, the team went into the match without its veteran hitter co-captain Mesaros, who went down with an ankle injury. The team fought vigorously to remain in contention, but the overpowering opposing squad made quick work of Bucknell, winning the match in three straight games, 15–1, 15–6 and 15–6.

Brenda Hayduk '96 sets outside hitter Katie Steele '96 against an opponent in last weekend's tournament at Bucknell. Both Hayduk and Steele were recognized for their play by being named as All-Tournament selections after the team garnered victories last weekend over St. Peter's and St. Francis (PA). Hayduk and Steele will hope to repeat their All-Tournament performances against the University of Alaska-Anchorage and the University of Alaska-Fairbanks next week.

Bucknell rounded out the competition against St. Francis (Pa). The team regrouped quickly from the loss to St. Bonaventure, and won the match three games to one, 12–15, 15–4, 15–6, 15–12. Steele once again controlled the match with 11 kills and was assisted by a nine-kill effort from Colleen Conway '94. Spinney held the Lady Spikers advantage by recording ten digs.

DINK SHOTS

—Joanne Lewis '95 is ranked third in the Patriot League in ace average. She has nine aces in eleven games.

—Katie Steele '96 and Sarah Mesaros '93 are ranked eighth and tenth respectively in the Patriot League in hitting percentage.

Service errors plagued the women througout the match. Whenever the team seemed to gain an advantage over the opponent, it would lose it on a service error. The Lady Spikers tallied a total of 14 service errors over the three game match.

With Bucknell down two games, the foul stench of an upset was in the air. In the third game, Lock Haven jumped out to a commanding ten to three lead. The match appeared to be over, but the Lady Spikers fought through many unforced errors to tie the game up at ten. Yet the lack of consistency throughout the match returned, and the team dropped the last game 16–14 and thus the match. Lock Haven continually allowed the home team opportunities to win each of the three games, yet the Lady Spikers just seemed to be in a generous mood. A disappointed Opalski felt that the team lacked focus and communication. "I really felt like we were the better team, yet they [Lock Haven] worked hard and got the job done. I think that they wanted it [the game] more."

The Lady Spikers will travel on Wednesday for five days to the frigid tundra of Alaska to compete against the University of Alaska at Anchorage and at Fairbanks. Opalski is looking forward to the competition as Fairbanks is ranked 22nd in the nation. Bucknell will then return home on October 3rd to face Navy and Robert Morris.

Bison soccer split with Lehigh, Susquehanna

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Backup goalie Ken Prothero '96 makes a great hand save against Susquehanna and helped to preserve the team's 8-0 shutout. It was Bucknell's first of the season.

After suffering a shutout loss only four days earlier, the Bucknell men's soccer team needed a strong victory over Division III Susquehanna University Tuesday night to put itself back on track.

They got one.

Playing under a bloated, orange harvest moon, Bucknell (0-1, 3-1) disintegrated the Susquehanna Crusaders (0-3) by a score of 8-0. The convincing win followed the team's only loss of the season, a 2-0 decision at Lehigh last Saturday.

The star of Tuesday's game was Greg Beatty '95, who notched two goals and an assist. He very well could have scored a third goal, but his shot in the 32nd minute struck the crossbar. The sophomore from Kennett Square, Pa. is now the team's leading goal scorer, with four to his credit.

A two year starter, Beatty worked hard to prepare himself for this game. "I've had problems [with this game. "I've had problems [with defenders fouling me from behind]" he said, "But I worked with Brian Buck '95 [yesterday] during practice with him playing rough and fouling me." His preparation certainly worked, if Tuesday night was any indication.

Bucknell scored early and often against the Crusaders. Ryan Bucceri '94 opened the scoring only six minutes into the game by putting in one of five Bucknell goals in the opening half. Beatty followed in the 17th minute with his first goal of the game.

In the 24th minute, Bucceri notched his second goal, this time from Rick Shaheen '95 off of a corner kick for a 3-0 lead. Shaheen assisted the fourth goal in the same manner, this time to Craig Shryock '94.

With only five minutes remaining in the half, Scott Tardibuono '93 received a pass from Bruce MacKenzie '95 and quickly converted it into a goal and a 5-0 lead at the half.

The Bison dominated the first half (and the game) in every category. Nowhere was this reality more evident, perhaps, than in the fact that Bucknell outshot Susquehanna 13-2 in the first half (19-4 in the game), and received six more corner kicks (7-1 and 8-2, respectively).

The second half was more of the same, only to a more humane extent. The Bison scored three more times, and possibly could have scored more if not for an obvious restriction imposed on the offense by coach Craig Reynolds during the last 20 minutes of play. At one point, the Bison had three players in front of the goal with only the keeper and one defender to beat, and the ball was passed back to sweeper Pete Radano '95 in the defensive half of the field.

Jon MacKenzie '93 opened the second half scoring in the contest's 55th minute. Beatty moved the ball down the right wing, dribbled in towards the goal, and at the last possible moment passed the ball off to MacKenzie, who merely had to put the ball into an empty goal.

The two men repeated the feat less than a minute later, this time with Beatty scoring the goal. The scoring plays were almost identical, with Beatty and MacKenzie knowing exactly where the other was playing. This is their second year playing alongside one another, and their familiarity was obvious. "[Jon] and I worked well together last year," Beatty explained later. "He got most of my assists last year."

Brian Breslin '95 closed the scoring in the 61st minute thanks to a tremendous individual effort. Receiving a long through-ball on the right wing, Breslin dribbled the ball through numerous defenders and finally put the ball neatly past a demoralized Susquehanna goalkeeper.

The eight goals that Bucknell scored fell one short of equaling the number of goals that Susquehanna had allowed in their previous two games (both losses), having been outscored 9-1 before this contest.

Last Saturday, the Bison suffered a tough loss to Patriot League rival Lehigh by a score of 2-0. Both goals were scored by Scott Chinitz, who was the league co-leader in scoring last year, and on top of the stat sheet in scoring this year as well. The loss dropped the Bison to 0-1 in the Patriot League and 2-1 overall. Lehigh raised its record to 1-0 in the league, and 2-3 overall.

Tomorrow, the team travels to Holy Cross to play its second Patriot League match of the year. Holy Cross lost its first league game of the year to Fordham, 1-0, and they are 0-3 overall. They have been outscored 8-1 by their opponents this year, so look for the Bison to repeat Tuesday night's overwhelming success.

Just for the fun of it

And now, if you will, a word about intramurals.

Bucknell's intramural activities present an intriguing scenario, as they involve perhaps the most students at the University yet receive the least campus-wide attention of any program here. They go on through the year without a great deal of fanfare, and perhaps that is the reason that they are taken for granted. Nonetheless, any Bucknellian who has taken part in an intramural season knows that it can be an experience that should be taken as anything but banal.

What has never failed to impress me over the years has been the ability for a tight soccer game, volleyball match, or flag-football contest to inevitably band together even the most unlikely of individuals with one another for a common purpose: to beat whoever is on the other side of the ball. While it is true that you'll find teams who simply wish to goof around and have a fun time (that being another vital role of the forum of intramural competition, of course), it has been my experience that most players show up at game time bent on giving every iota of energy that their often out-of-shape bodies can turn out.

Be they former high school athletes who didn't quite make the cut for Bucknell's varsity sports, fans of the game, adrenaline junkies, or guys who just want to hit somebody, these intramural players all share a desire to take an active part in athletics rather than to simply watch them for the duration of their collegiate careers. Some of their sports fantasies are realized, many are not, but every player at least comes away from the game with the wonderful muscle soreness and knee raspberries that let you know that you got playing time. In essence, then, the best of both worlds are achieved—for, as intramural games are bereft of the sometimes harsh spotlight that varsity sports can direct on their players, they allow the pain of a tough loss to fade away quickly enough while still letting the athlete fully appreciate the rigors of competition in a pressure-free atmosphere.

Another unique aspect of the intramural program has to be the utter anarchy that usually prevails right before game time that gives the games that extra dash of spice: Will we get enough guys out here to field a team, or will we have to forfeit? The ref's in lab? Man, those guys look mean—but they look stupid, too! I think we can take 'em! I didn't bring the ball... Did you? And so it goes.

One particular soccer season from my sophomore year jumps to mind regarding this phenomenon. My hall's team had gathered for a game at the Mod fields one Tuesday afternoon to find that only two players from the opposing team had managed to show up. The pair informed us that they would return with a full team if we would just give them ten more minutes, and then they ran off before we could reply.

A forfeit victory apparently under our belts, we began to scrimmage against another team whose opposition had not shown up that day either. Within fifteen minutes, my team had totally forgotten about its erstwhile scheduled competition.

Then, within half an hour, our erst-

Lady Bison bow to Lehigh for first loss

Women's soccer is shut out by the Engineers at home 2-0, destroy Mt. St. Mary's on the road 12-0

BY BILL BROWN AND T.K. DRAPER

Utilizing a suffocating defense and two goals from senior midfielder Donna Corrado, Lehigh defeated Bucknell 2-0 in a Patriot League women's soccer match last Saturday.

This disappointing setback dropped the Bison record to 2-1.

Lehigh head coach Kevin Babyak attributed the victory to superior defense and a relentless effort overall. "Team defense was the key," said Babyak. "We were very aggressive. Our offense was generated by our defense—our goals came from loose balls that we won through hard work."

Kolleen Kirk

Jessica Wright '95 handles the ball in last week's game against Lehigh. To the right is goalie Kim Fekel '93, who recorded her first shutout of the year yesterday.

The most impressive defensive performance was turned in by freshman midfielder Courtney Rossi, who was assigned the extremely difficult task of containing Bucknell's biggest scoring threat, Lisa Gibbons '95. Gibbons entered the game with four goals in the opening two contests, but Rossi neutralized Gibbons and eliminated her as a major factor in the outcome of the battle.

Babyak reserved high praise for his inexperienced defender, saying, "Gibbons is an excellent player. Rossi basically shut her down—that was the thrust of our defense."

Dia Johnson, also a freshman midfielder for the Engineers, lauded her teammate Rossi as well. "Courtney did an excellent job on Gibbons. She had no hesitation in defending Gibbons."

Rossi humbly acknowledged her remarkable defensive effort. "Gibbons is very quick. I just shadowed her."

Bucknell's entire offense was stifled by Lehigh, managing a mere three shots on goal. Lehigh goalkeeper Amy Mizoras intercepted all three attempts.

Lehigh claimed the upper hand promptly when, less than three minutes into the game, at 42:27, Corrado tallied her first goal unassisted.

With 29:12 left in the first half, Gibbons made a terrific pass to Sara Patiro '95, who had a clear shot on goal. However, this attempt failed.

Three minutes later, Gibbons beat two defenders but was then thwarted by the sudden emergence of additional alert Lehigh players.

Later, Lehigh senior defender Erin Gallivan's shot missed to the right of the goal at 24:36.

With 16:14 left before halftime, Bucknell goalkeeper Kim Fekel '93 bobbled a shot, and Corrado immediately kicked the ball in for her second unassisted goal of the game.

Fekel made a bold decision at 11:36. With the ball rolling slowly toward the goal and Lehigh players in hot pursuit, Fekel charged the ball and swiftly booted it away.

Defense dominated the second half. No goals were scored and there was a paucity of attempted shots.

Villanova blanks Bucknell once more 34-0

Powerful Wildcat defense, behind six-sack effort, mauls Bison running attack in the city of Brotherly Love

BY JON TERRY

Bucknellian Staff Writer

Overmatched is the best adjective to describe the Bucknell football squad after its 34-0 loss last Saturday at Villanova. Realistically, the best the Bison could hope for was a few good series and to keep the score respectable. In that respect, they accomplished their goal.

Villanova, a Division I-AA powerhouse who lost to eventual I-AA champion Youngstown State in last year's playoffs, simply toyed with the Bison throughout the first 30 minutes, taking a 28-0 halftime lead. Bucknell then hung with Villanova's reserves in the second half, allowing only six points.

> "That is as outstanding a I-AA defense as I've ever seen, and I've seen a lot of I-AA football."
> —Head Coach Lou Maranzana

Actually, Villanova could have stopped scoring after their second drive of the game. A four-yard run by Kevin Mosely capped a 10-play, 67-yard drive and gave the Wildcats a 7-0 lead. As dominant as the 'Cats defense is, another touchdown run by Mosely, two scoring strikes from quarterback Tom Colombo, and one touchdown pass from Brad Parpan provided the superfluous points.

Villanova's defense has yet to allow a point in two games this season, and they showed their stuff on Saturday by sacking Bucknell quarterbacks six times and surrendering just 16 net rushing yards. The Bison's only true threat of Villanova's goal line came late in the fourth quarter when quarterback Rob Glus '95 went to the passing game, driving the ball down to the Villanova 15-yard line. The 51-yard march went for naught, however, when Glus had his next pass picked off at the goal line.

The Bison ground attack which looked so impressive against Division II Bloomsburg a week earlier took one serious reality check against the large and quick Villanova defensive line. After Matt Walsh '93 and Kevin McElvene '93, led the Bison to 238 rushing yards against Bloomsburg, the two fullbacks were only able to accumulate 50 yards on the ground last week. The longest carry of the day was a nine-yarder by Walsh in the second quarter.

Bucknell head coach Lou Maranzana was equally impressed by the Wildcats' defense. "Every one of their front guys is so solid," said Maranzana. "We weren't able to sustain our blocks on the line of scrimmage. That is as outstanding a I-AA defense as I have ever seen, and I've seen a lot of I-AA football."

On the other side of the ball, Bucknell's defense could do nothing about Villanova's ground attack. Eleven different Wildcats carried the ball a total of 50 times for 313 yards.

Saturday's contest marked the second consecutive year in which Villanova has pounded the Bison. Last year at Christy Matthewson Stadium, 'Nova prevailed 40-0. Those two losses are the only two shutouts the Bison have suffered in the past seven years.

After the loss on Saturday, Maranzana took the game in stride and had nothing but respect for Villanova. "Villanova is a real good football team," he remarked. "I was a little disappointed we couldn't match up a little better physically. I thought we played hard, but Villanova is so tough and we couldn't get anything consistent going. Mentally, though, we never quit. Our kids hung in there, and I was proud of them."

Lost in the all of the down sides to Saturday's game was a major milestone in the career of wide receiver Whitey Berardinelli

Dunlop announces upcoming retirement

Dean of Students will leave Bucknell as of August 31 concluding 26 years of dedicated service to the campus community

BY MARIA GLOD AND DEB MANASSE

Bucknellian Staff Writers

After twenty six years at Bucknell, John P. Dunlop has announced that he will retire from his position as Dean of Students as of August 31, 1993. Dunlop began his Bucknell career when he was appointed to the position of Dean of Men in 1967. He was named Associate Dean of Student Affairs the following year and in 1968 became Dean of Student Affairs.

Dunlop leaves the University having earned the great respect of the campus community. "I don't think you will find anyone working in this University who cares more about students than John Dunlop," said Ruth Burnham, Associate Dean for Orientation and activities.

> "I don't think you will find anyone working in this University who cares more about students than John Dunlop"
> — Ruth Burnham, Associate Dean of Orientation and Activities

This sentiment is echoed by faculty, staff, administration and students alike.

"The kind of relationship he has established with the students will be hard to replace," said Gerry Commerford, Assistant dean for Housing.

His rapport with students has helped the sometimes opposing members of the university community to work together. "Dean Dunlop breaches the gap between students and administration and the students will miss him," said Mike Thomas '93 Bucknell Student Government President.

According to Dunlop, student life at Bucknell has changed significantly over the past 26 years. "Bucknell has moved from an institution that was struggling to find an identity to a national institution of real quality and justified repute" said Dunlop.

"I've seen student life come almost full circle in the time I've been here," said Dunlop. "When I first came to Bucknell, institutes of higher education were run in a very authoritarian manner; the faculty was supposed to teach, the students were supposed to learn, and the administrators were supposed to administer."

This period of strict regulation ended in the late 60's and early 70's at a time when the Civil Rights movement was underway, racial prejudice was being questioned and the Vietnam war was ongoing.

"Students began to raise questions about societal issues and simultaneously began to question the rules and regulations under which they had to live," said Dunlop. "We took the position that the students were young adults who required a minimal amount of supervision and regulation" This notion prevailed throughout the seventies and early eighties.

The mid-eighties brought the return of more involvement by the college in the regulation of student life. This trend has continued into the present as the expectations of parents have shifted. "The students in colleges in the late sixties and early seventies who rebelled against the status quo are now the parents of college age students," said Dunlop. "These parents have been instrumental in requiring greater involvement in the monitoring and direction of student life."

Nonetheless, Dunlop has continued to feel strongly about the importance of keeping the students intimately involved with the decisions that affect them. "We are working in developing a new partnership between students and administration so that students will have an appropriate voice in their own destiny and the future of Bucknell." Over the past years committees and task forces composed of members from all facets of the campus community have been installed in an attempt to foster the growth of this type of partnership.

John Dunlop has developed a reputation for emphasizing relations between students and administartion and has worked dilligently to ensure that students have a voice in the direction of the University.

Dunlop received a bachelor of science degree from Southwest Missouri State College. After four years of duty in the U.S. Air Force, he earned a master's degree in educational psychology from the University of Texas and a doctorate in philosophy from the University of Connecticut. His first job was as Assistant to Dean of Men at the University of Cincinnati where he met his wife Gail, who was then a secretary in the department. Dunlop also served as Dean of Men at the University of Connecticut before coming to Bucknell.

Dunlop has been a valuable member of the Bucknell community in many aspects and both students and administrators have recognized his deep committment to Bucknell. In 1972, the student body dedicated the yearbook, L'Agenda to Dunlop, citing him as "a man whose warmth, understanding, patience, and energetic spirit are recognized by all who have come into contact with him."

University President Gary Sojka expressed his sadness at Dunlop's departure stating that he "is going to lose a good colleague" and adding that he believes the students

Homecoming organizers prepare for weekend festival

BY CATHY DARRUP

Bucknellian Staff Writer

Alumni and friends are welcomed back to campus this Homecoming weekend by the "Medieval Madness" pervading the campus.

Preparations for Homecoming '92 have been underway since last March. The Medieval theme was chosen then and six separate committees were formed to create and organize activities for the weekend. Carolyn Hoyt '87, Assistant Director of Alumni Relations, has been assigned the job of organizing and overseeing the events for this Homecoming weekend.

From l to r: Marc Wachter '95, Beth Cahill '95, Chrissy Toto '95 and Matt Winkleman '95 decorate the Alpha Phi Omega float for the Homecoming parade on Sat.

The tasks accomplished by the six committees are crucial to the overall success of the weekend. Each of their jobs are inter-related and committee members share the common goal of making Bucknell the place to be this weekend for current students, alumni, and the Lewisburg community.

The committees are chaired by students and are overseen by Debbie Bravaro '93, who acts as a liason between committee members and the administration.

The publicity committee, chaired by Cheryl Stogowski '93, is in charge of keeping the campus and the community informed and involved. Their biggest job was the creation of approximately thirty felt banners, now hanging on display throughout campus, in stores and from lampposts downtown.

The committee's mission, according to Hoyt, "is to get the whole town involved" in the weekend's festivities. Hoyt noted that most Lewisburg stores will stay open extra hours this weekend to accomodate students and alumni.

Publicity people are also working in conjunction with the parade committee to distribute "ring pops" (the head of a lollipop on top of a plastic ring, which look like the gaudy jewelry fashionable in the Medieval days) and chocolate coins wrapped in golden paper. Candies will be given out throughout the weekend.

The parade committee, chaired by Kristin Froehlich '94, has also been working with the people of Lewisburg to make Homecoming a community effort. Businesses have offered flatbeds for the parade, and townspeople have offered their classic or antique cars to be on display.

Hall of Fame inductees and hosts and hostesses will ride in some of the cars. William "Bud" Wilkinson '36 (football), David Kucera '85 (football) and Chris Seneca '87 (basketball) will be inducted into Bucknell's Hall of Fame on Saturday before the parade.

The hosts (seniors Peter Brady, David Granson, Denis Maguire and Russell Peyton) and hostesses (seniors Anne Buck, Margaret Grunow, Megan Karakelian and Lauren Scott) will also ride in the parade. They have been honored, according to Campus crime raises tough questions

BY ANDREW COHEN

Bucknellian Staff Writer

In the course of their preparation for the real world, many Bucknellians come into more than casual contact with the University's internal judicial system as well as that of the state of Pennsylvania. According to Vincent DeCerchio, Director of Public Safety, of the nearly 700 reported incidents from that office per academic year, approximately 85% are criminal in nature. However, breaking the law within the confines of the Bucknell campus does not always result in the preferment of criminal charges with the local police.

For the most part, criminal infractions on campus are dealt with initially by the department of public safety since, according to Barry Maxwell, vice-president for administration, the local police "will not normally come on campus without being called."

While John Dunlop, Dean of Students, insisted that there is "no understanding, or arrangement, or detente, or accord," between the police and the University, he did acknowledge that there is a de facto notion of police restraint because, "there is a courtesy there, East Buffalo and Lewisburg Police do not want to inject themselves into our internal affairs unless they have to, and they're understaffed to boot."

Barry Hosterman, chief of the East Buffalo Township Police department, which is responsible for the campus on the uphill side of Seventh Street, also denied any formal agreement with the University contending that "in the normal course of our duties we do patrol the campus...because the Bucknell students deserve the same police protection" as other township residents.

Lewisburg Police Chief Donald Heiter did refer to a "mutual agreement-type situation." He noted that while, "Bucknell is not a sanctuary... it is Security's job, and if they need us, they'll call us."

The decision as to which cases are "sufficiently serious to warrant the filing of charges by the university with the local criminal justice system... are made on a case-by-case basis by a committee consisting of the vice-president for administration (Maxwell), the director of public safety (DeCerchio) and the dean of students (Dunlop), according to the Bucknell Student Handbook.

As a result of meeting so many times, said Maxwell, "there are some criminal violations that are automatically referred to the police, such as felonies and tampering with fire equipment."

According to DeCerchio, felonies and misdemeanors, which comprise approximately 3% and 13% of the total public safety calls respectively, "are referred downtown to the police." However, "summary offenses which are minor offenses," but comprise approximately 69% of all public safety calls, "are evaluated on a case by case basis by the committee which, depending on the circumstances, exercises that same latitude that a police officer has."

With cases that are taken up by the committee, Maxwell "takes the recommendations from the dean of students and the director of security, and we have rarely disagreed."

According to DeCerchio, "Less than half of these cases are sent downtown."

However, even this apparently cut and dried formula has its intricacies. Both physical and sexual assault are crimes that, according to Dunlop, the university "takes a very dim view of...and would like to see go downtown." Dunlop continued, "If I understand the law correctly, however, you can't do it. The individual is the aggrieved party, not the university."

Gerry Commerford, assistant dean of student life, did note that in the case of physical assault within the university "we may press charges if we feel it's in the best interest of the university."

In the case of sexual assault, internal as well as external charges can only be filed by the individual involved since "we have to respect the wishes of victim," according to Dunlop.

Further questions regarding public safety arise from the fact that in cases of any illegal drug possession, "it has to go downtown. We have zero discretion about that one," said Dunlop. Whereas under-aged drinking "is handled within the university system."

Although, according to Dr. Steckshulte, director of the Student Health Service, "alcohol is more physiologically addictive than marijuana," according to Maxwell, "the perception and the reality is that drugs pose a far more long-term and short-term clear and present danger to the individual and the institution."

Hosterman added that Act 31 gives "college campuses the authorization and the responsibility to deal with alcohol possession, but not the drug problem." Dunlop added, "We've declared a war on drugs, not alcohol."

DeCerchio noted that one ought not

New policy proposed for alcohol violations

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A new schedule of sanctions may replace Bucknell's current alcohol policy. The proposal, considered last year, would eliminate the use of fines for alcohol offenders, and deal with offenders according to the seriousness of the alcohol violation.

According to Barbara Shailor, Vice President of Student Services, the system needed revamping. "Many people were particularly dissatisfied with the current system." Shailor appointed a special task committee last year consisting of a well-rounded representation of the Bucknell community. The committee included 4 students, 4 administrators, and 2 resource persons.

"These proposed sanctions show how... we can educate our students in and out of the classroom" —Barbara Shailor, Vice President of Student Services

Since 1989, the procedure for dealing with alcohol policy offenders consisted of a fine of $50, or 10 hours of community service. In addition, students found consuming alcohol illegally were punished exactly the same as students found in a room where alcohol was being consumed.

Under the proposed system, alcohol education would replace fines and community service. The ultimate goal is that students will hold themselves more accountable for their actions, according to Shailor. Students would also be sanctioned individually, depending on the degree of the violation.

"These proposed sanctions show how, as an educational institution, we can educate our students in and out of the classroom," said Shailor.

Gerry Commerford, Dean of Housing, has also been involved in the review of the current system of alcohol policy enforcement. "The University needs to re-look at what they're doing", Commerford explained. "It is definitely time for a review after 3 years," Shailor added.

The subject of fining has sparked controversy on campus. "The use of fines discriminates against students that cannot afford it," said Commerford. "For some individuals, the fine becomes a heavy burden." Students are unmotivated when it comes to community service, he added. Workers at the Physical Plant have been forced to accompany students during their 10 hours of punishment. Many students either leave before they have completed their required service time, or do not show up at all.

Before this proposal can be implemented, it must go through the proper channels. First, it must be considered by the general counsel for the school, attorney Elias Abelson. From there, it must travel to the Committee of Complimentary Activities (CCA), and the Bucknell Student Government (BSG). The last channel would be president Gary Sojka, who ultimately decides whether or not the proposal will be adopted.

If met with approval, the system would be put into effect immediately. Current punitive measures have been witheld until the proposal has been approved or rejected. "The proposed changes are not big, but they imply greater points of emphasis," Commerford said.

However, the University is still constrained by Pennsylvania state law to enforce its alcohol consumption policy. "The university takes seriously its responsibility of complying with state law," Commerford explained.

The policy will remain the same, with only a change in the enforcement of sanctions. Students disobeying the university's policy toward alcohol consumption will still be met with punitive action, Commerford added.

A date was not given as to when the policy could be rejected or approved. "I believe," Commerford concluded, "that if adopted, the proposal would provide for a healthier and fairer Bucknell environment."

overlook the importance of alcohol since it is a factor "in the overwhelming majority of the incidents. Most of our problems occur when people are intoxicated and can't handle it." Maxwell, Dunlop, and DeCerchio agreed that reporting all of the alcohol violations to the police "would overload the courts" according to Maxwell.

A final area of ambiguity exists with regard to the status of the offender. The aforementioned criteria apply only to students.

According to Dunlop, "There may be a difference in the way they treat students and non-students. If it's one of our own, we decide what to do unless the police are involved from the beginning." However, according to Maxwell, "It is automatically referred to the police when somebody not associated with the institution engages in criminal activity."

Maxwell also noted that where alumni may be involved in criminal activity, "we'd certainly be more sensitive to the fact that the person is one of our own. But if that person presents a threat, we would certainly have to deal with that."

While some may question the practice of not referring all criminal offenses to the local police, administrators defend the practice. "We as an educational institution believe that one of the primary results of discipline has to be education," Commerford said. "As a consequence that's what we rely on, as well as the notion that we ought to be able to take care of what happens on our own."

Furthermore, DeCerchio suggests an advantage in overall efficiency because "the internal judicial system, in some cases can deal more effectively with these minor offenses." Commerford added that within the internal system, "most students admit involvement."

Breaking the law is serious and so are the consequences according to Heiter. "We get a lot of calls to our department for security clearances... Employers do want alcohol, drug, and other criminal related offenses. What they do here means a lot in their future."

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, September 17

At approximately 4:40 p.m., an unknown individual(s) removed a knapsack and its contents from the rack just outside the Elaine Langone Center Bookstore. The student reporting the theft stated the value of the missing property at approximately $110.00.

Public Safety officers responded to the front of the Fieldhouse for a reported ankle injury. The student had twisted her ankle earlier at the lacrosse field. Officers contacted the Student Health Service and the student was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital for further assistance.

Friday, September 18

A minor vehicle accident occurred at 11:00 a.m. in the Public Safety parking lot. A student's vehicle and a Public Safety vehicle were involved in the accident but there was only minor damage to the cars. No injuries were reported.

Sometime between 5:00 p.m., September 18 and 1:30 a.m., September 20 an unknown person(s) forcibly entered a Mod at Bucknell West and removed approximately 125 compact discs and a wallet. Investigation into the matter is continuing.

Saturday, September 19

Residents of a Mod in Bucknell West reported to Public Safety officers that they were the victims of a burglary sometime between 8:20 p.m. on September 19 and 1:30 a.m. on September 20. Unknown person(s) apparently entered the Mod through an unlocked window. Numerous compact discs, cassette tapes and personal items were removed. Investigation into the matter is being conducted.

Sunday, September 20

Public Safety officers responded to Swartz Hall at 12:48 a.m. for a reported fire alarm. Upon arrival officers discovered a student room in the C-wing was full of smoke. Popcorn that was left unattended in a microwave was labeled as the cause for the fire alarm activation.

Officers responded to Vaughan Literature Road at 2:06 a.m. for a reported confrontation in progress. Upon arrival officers ascertained that an altercation had occurred moments earlier at a fraternity house and continued on to Vaughan Literature Road. Two students sustained injuries. One student was treated and released from the emergency room at Evangelical Community Hospital. Investigation is continuing by Public Safety and the East Buffalo Police Department.

At 1:24 a.m., officers were dispatched to the rear of Kress Hall for a reported unconscious person. Upon arrival officers found a student suffering from an apparent alcohol overdose. Due to the condition of the student an ambulance was dispatched and transported the victim to the emergency room at Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment.

Monday, September 21

Officers were dispatched to the Ziegler Health Center at 9:02 a.m. for a medical assist. A Bucknell employee had taken ill while working in Swartz Hall. An ambulance was dispatched and transported the employee to Evangelical Community Hospital for further assistance.

At 12:30 p.m. a fraternity president reported to Public Safety that an individual had shot a BB gun in the direction of the house at 4:30 a.m. that day. Further inspection revealed that three panes of glass were damaged at the house. The incident continues to be investigated.

A fraternity president reported at 12:30 p.m. on this day that an unknown person(s) damaged and removed part of a fraternity sign from the front of the house. The incident occurred between 2:00 a.m. and 3:00 a.m.

A fraternity brother reported to Public Safety at 12:45 p.m. that three panes of window glass were broken at the house. It is unknown at this time when this act occurred or by what means the window was broken.

Where are they now?

Career Development Center tracks graduates

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellia Staff Writer

As Bucknellian alumni migrate back to Lewisburg this weekend, memories of life in "The Bucknell Bubble" are on the lips of nearly every graduate. These past scholars and residents of the Bucknell community will escape "real life" for a few days but come Sunday evening, they will tread back to to Route 15 and real life in a real job. But where will they be going and what will they be doing Monday morning? The Career Development Center has attempted to find out.

Recent Bucknell graduates as a whole have fared well in their post-graduation plans; most have joined the work force or have continued their education at a higher level. The Career Development Center has conducted an annual survey of graduates that, according to Mark Kerr, director, "acquires information on job titles, types of employing organizations, how each student learned about the position obtained, reasons for accepting the position, data on other offers, graduate and professional school financial aid, students' attitudes towards Bucknell's preparatory experiences, and students' evaluation of the Career Development Center services."

A computer program has been utilized since 1985-86 for the collection of this data.

The first mailing was sent in September following graduation, a follow-up mailing was completed in October, and final data was accrued in January by a telephone survey.

Participation has averaged approximately 80% for the past five years, with the Class of '91 having the highest rate with 91% participation. Statistics are not yet available for the Class of '92, but a summary analysis for the past fifteen graduating classes are available in the Career Development Center.

The Center emphasizes that a generalization of results would be invalid because of a lack of information on a significant group of non-respondents.

On the average, approximately 70% of Bucknell graduates since the Class of '87 have reported that they were employed at the time the survey was conducted. On-campus interviews, networking and other personal contacts helped graduates secure employment.

The Prudential, Merck, Anderson Consulting, General Electric and Price Waterhouse firms have been consistent top-hiring firms for Bucknell graduates. Newly-hired graduates have earned median salaries in the $22,000 to $29,000 price range for the past five years, which is generally higher than the national average.

Of the employed group, an average 75% have jobs in business and industry, 15% are in education, and smaller numbers were employed by the government, military service, or non-profit organizations.

Approximately 27% of Bucknell graduates continue their education at a higher institution.

Law and the humanities have been the most popular choices for graduate programs.

will miss him as well. "He puts the welfare of the students ahead of even his own welfare," said Sojka.

According to Barbara Shailor, Special Assistant to President, Affirmative Action, the University will have adjustments to make following loss of member of its has been at the institution for so "It's going to be tion."

John Dunlop began his tenure at Bucknell as Dean of Men.

Dunlop plans to stay in Lewisburg after his retirement and enjoy some time with his family. "I want to spend more time than I ever have before with my grandchildren, my grandchildren." He and his wife will spend their summers working at a summer camp for young children. "I'm not going to leave here with all kinds of new plans and commitments. I'm just going to close the curtain on this experience and see what comes along."

"I think you can truly represent Bucknell as a great school and it's getting better all the time" said Dunlop. "I'm leaving with mixed emotions."

Campus groups aid hurricane victims

BY MICHELLE MANZO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Hands Unite for Hurricane Fight,Catholic Campus Ministry and Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity have been working with the Union County Chapter of the American Red Cross in separate programs designed to provide aid to the victims of Hurricane Andrew through the disaster relief operation.

On Saturday, October 3, Bucknell's Campus Catholic Ministry will sponsor Hands Unite for Hurricane Fight. Hands Unite is an independent organization that has been working since early September to gather support for the hurricane victims.

Those involved in Hands Unite will congregate at noon next Saturday on the lawns between Rooke Chapel and the Langone Center to publicly demonstrate their concern for those affected by the natural disasters that have recently devestated Florida and Louisiana.

"The idea is to get everyone to stand as a community...," said Lisa Blackman, co-chairperson of Hands Unite, "...to have our community reaching out to the communities of Louisiana and Florida."

Chairperson James Bonafedi, with the help of Blackman and others "wants to raise money for the people that experienced devastation due to Hurricane Andrew."

The organization is non-profit and non-exclusive. Everyone is encouraged to register and support Hands Unite. The money that is donated will all be offered to victims of the storm.

Many Bucknell organizations have been notified and asked to participate in the donation process. All individuals are invited to come register and stand on the lawn on Saturday, Oct. 3.

In addition, Hands Unite is attempting to incorporate the rest of the Lewisburg Communityinto the project.

According to Blackman, the program will be even more successful if CCM is able to involve local citizens "through donations and participation from the community."

The Union County Chapter of the Red Cross here in Pennsylvania are also helping to handle publicity in Lewisburg.

When all donations are collected, the Red Cross will allocate the money in Florida and Louisiana respectively.

"We felt that the Red Cross distributes a large percentage of their funds to the victims instead of using the money to go back into their organization," explained Blackman.

Individuals can register in the Langone Center Mall during the week of Monday, September 28 to Friday, October 2 between 11:00 and 12:00 PM. A five dollar donation is required.

The brothers of Sigma Alpha Epsilon Fraternity held a raffle to benefit the disaster victims. The fraternity donated $400 to the Disaster Relief Fund of the American Red Cross.

"Our fraternity wanted to do its part to help the hurricane victims get their lives back in order," said Sean Heaney '93, SAE secretary.

"It's wonderful to see college students take an interest in the problems that effect others around the country," said Ann Glock, Executive Director of the Union County Chapter of the American Red Cross.

Senior gift drive begins

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Wednesday, September 30 marks the kickoff of the Annual Senior Gift Drive. A tradition begun in 1967, the Senior gift Drive is a fund-raising effort organized, launched, and managed by the members of the senior class.

Money raised directly aids the university in providing assistance for various aspects of Bucknell including, financial aid, campus facilities, program enhancements, low-student-faculty ratio, and advanced equipment. These donations are a suppplement, considering tuition only covers approximately 70% of the cost of a Bucknell education.

Jody Foss—The Bucknellian
Linda Hollinshead leads the Senior Gift Drive Committee

In the past, the SGD used do- nations in the form of a single class gift. However, there have been two changes in the current program, the seniors can pledge money to any aspect of Annual Giving that he or she wishes.

The other change is the solicitation for donations over a five-year pledge period. This translates into a more feasible payment system, rather than a one lump sum. The first pledge payment would be due a year after graduation.

The SGD would not be a success without the devotion of the senior members on its committee. Residing co-chairperson Linda Hollinshead and an 11 member steering committee organize the entire SGD with the aid of advisor Sarah McAskill aand the Office of Annual Giving. It is the committee's responsibility to solicit pledges from the senior class.

Both the chairperson and the steering committee were chosen as far back as spring of last semester. "The members chosen", says Linda, "are people that can be trusted with a certain degree of responsibility." Each committee member represents a major residence complex and/or a student constituency(i.e. independent, sorority, fraternity).

Chairperson Londa Hollinshead projects a goal of raising $100,000 by the end of the drive. "I don't find this goal too unreasonable,"Linda reassures. She feels no pressure in exceeding last years' figure of approximately $117,000.

There is no minimum or maximum pledge donation. But as an incentive, seniors pledging $500 or more have the chance to win an all-expense-paid trip for two to New York City. Seniors pledging $250 or more will receive a 1993 Senior Gift Drive T-shirt.

It is Miss Hollinshead's hope that "in the better part of four years of your life at Bucknell, every student will find some aspect of their experience that they really enjoyed. That is the reason why seniors should give back to Bucknell."

In fact, the whole SGD committee believes that pledges should be made with the utmost sincere intentions. The Student Gift Drive provides an excellent opportunity for senior undergraduates to realize the importance of alumni support.

The Alumni Association, in an attempt to lend support to the SGD, is promising to make a gift of $5,000 if the majority of the class of 1993 participates in the drive.

The SGD's biggest campaigning will take place in the upcoming two weeks. It is during this time that completed pledge cards are given to any Steering Committee members designated on campus. The majority of the campaigning will end on October 23. However, seniors abroad during the fall will be solicited during second semester.

Bucknellian Staff Alumni are invited to an open house in The Bucknellian office 4:30 to 6:00 on Saturday

News Briefs

On Campus

Need a ride?

Judy Martin, head of Transportation Services, is currently coordinating shuttle rides to Harrisburg or Williamsport Airport for students leaving campus for Fall Break

The deadline for reservations is Wednesday, October 7. Students may reserve rides by stopping at the Office of Transportation Services on the first floor of Marts Hall.

Shuttles will begin as soon as classes end on Friday, October 9.

For students whose schedule does not allow for these shuttles, the Office will also provide information about public transportation, including a student discount on bus tickets to Philadelphia and New York City.

On being homosexual

The Gay/Lesbain/Bisexual Awareness Group will sponsor a lecture and workshop on Tuesday, September 29 at 7 p.m. in the Weis Center.

Brian McNaught, nationally known speaker, will speak on homosexuality and life as a gay male in America.

Craft courses offered

Bucknell's Craft Shop, under the direction of Molly Ross, is offering a selection of non-credit courses to students, staff members and the public.

Classes range from ceramics and calligraphy to breadbaking and German dessert pastries. Instruction is also offered in weaving, knitting, jewelry casting, and many other specialties.

Enrollment is limited. Interested parties may register by calling extension 1221, through the mail, or at the shop, located on the ground floor of Hunt Hall.

Elie Wiesel Prize offered to seniors

John C. Pyper, Associate Dean for the College of Arts and Sciences, has announced that Bucknell may submit three entries to the Elie Wiesel Prize in Essay Contest. Only current seniors may submit entries to this national competition.

Authors may choose to focus on "The Meaning of Ethics Today: Choices, Challenges and Changes," "What is the Ethical Legacy of the 20th Century?" or "Can Ethics Be Taught?"

Essays must be submitted by Monday, November 30.

Interested students may contact the Office of Arts and Sciences at 113 Marts Hall for more information.

Image of the new world

In commemoration of the quincentennial of Columbas' voyage to the Americas, the Latin American Studies Program is presenting an exhibit entitled "The Image of the New World."

The exhibit is on display in the Langone Center Cave until October 16. It features maps and drawings from the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries.

Alcohol Awareness

An organizational meeting will be held Wednesday, September 30 at 4:30 p.m. for anyone interested in helping to plan this year's National Collegiate Alcohol Awareness Week at Bucknell.

The meeting will be held in Langone Center Room 241A.

More information may be obtained by calling Bob Thomas at extension 1401 or Gerard Turbide at extension 1196.

Off Campus

Colleges reel from Andrew

Hurricane Andrew rampaged through southern Florida, causing extensive damage toampuses in the area.

The hurricane severely damaged the University of Miami and the Florida International University. The Homestead campus of Miami-Dade Community College was flattened by the violent storm.

Andrew hit the area on August 24. Approximately 2500 incoming freshmen and their parents were on the University of Miami campus for orientation activities. The school was scheduled to open August 27.

No dollar figure damage estimate was available, and school officials do not know when the institutions will open for the fall term.

Clinton and Yeakel campaign

Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton and Senator Al Gore made a brief campaign stop at the Lawrence County Fair near Clarion University on August 22.

Democratic senate candidate Lynn Yeakel offered the rally's introductory remarks. Yeakel criticized the Republican Party for using what she called the "politics of division."

The stop-off was made as part of the democratic presidential candidate's "On the Road to Change America" bus tour.

Language Resources

Students attending Franklin and Marshall College now have the opportunity to learn a second language with the help of a newly-established Language Resource Center.

The goal of the center is to recreate the country's technological environment on campus through the use of audio, visual and computer aids and programs.

Women's center dedicated

Franklin and Marshall in Lancaster recently dedicated the college's new Women's Center.

The center was established, according to a written proposal, in order to "provide space for men and women toeet informally and formally to discuss gender and women's issues."

Smith and Johnsen debate the controversial abortion issue

BY ALISA BLAND

Bucknell played host to an abortion debate Tuesday night to an emotional standing-room-only crowd. The two hour debate featured Susan Smith, Associate Legislative Director for the National Right to Life Committee, and Dawn Johnsen, Legal Director for the National Abortion Rights Action League. The debate gave each woman time for a speech, rebuttal, closing statements, and an opportunity to field questions from the audience.

Dawn Johnsen, Legal Director for the National Abortion Rights Action League advocated a woman's right to choose.

Johnsen began the debate by stating the stance of the pro-choice movement. She stated adamantly that she is not pro-abortion, but rather believes in a woman's right to choose for herself.

She called abortion an "enormously complex and deeply personal issue," giving this as the reason for her belief that the government should not impose one choice on all women.

Johnsen maintained that outlawing abortion would not end all abortions, but would simply make them much more dangerous. She encouraged the audience to vote for pro-choice officials at every level of government in the upcoming election emphasizing that no other election in history has meant so much for the lives and rights of women across the nation.

Susan Smith presented views in opposition to the pro-choice opinions advocated by Johnsen. She argued that the landmark 1973 Supreme Court decision on Roe vs. Wade is still being debated nineteen years later because it is gnawing at the national conscience. She believes that the abortion issue is not about the woman's right to choose, but rather about a woman's right to end a life. According to Smith, many women do not have an abortion because they want one, but because they feel that they have no other choice. Smith does not believe that desperation should be a factor in that decision.

"[An abortion is] a dangerous procedure that kills a baby," said Smith. "No one should have the right to take the life of an innocent child."

Susan Smith, Associate Legislative Director for the National Right to Life Committee received support from Bucknellians for Human Life.

Both debaters spoke in favor of a decrease in the number of abortions; however, the reasons for such advocacy differed between the two. Johnsen advocates making the public more aware of contraceptives through sex education, thereby preventing many unwanted pregnancies that are currently ending in abortion, while Smith believes that there can be no talk of contraception until the right to life is granted to every unborn child in America.

Crowd reaction to the debate varied. Some individuals were very emotional and clearly upset the the discussion while others remained more detached and objective. Brian Vettoso '95 and Jodie Eash '95 agreed that attending the debate was a worthwhile experience for them, but that the speakers did not really change of influence their opinions on the subject.

Jennifer Kalata '95 felt that the debate was timely and well done. "Since it is an election year and abortion is a volatile issue in today's society, I think that the program was extremely informative and important," said Kalata.

Hoyt, in a number of events throughout the week including introductions to Alumni and administration.

Hosts and hostesses were elected by a campus-wide voting process that was organized the host/hostesses committee. The committee is chaired by Rebecca Reed '94.

Nominations for the senior hosts and hostesses were taken last May, and that list was narrowed to thirteen by a selection board comprised of representatives from campus organizations and administration.

The student body participated in the final voting, which narrowed the field to the eight finalists.

Friday night activities have been organized by the dinner committee, which will host the Homecoming dinner under the tent on Swartz Field, and the entertainment committee, who organized a dessert theatre in the Terrance Room. This event will feature both student and alumni performances. The Friday night committees are chaired by Kara Cook '93 (dinner) and Jody MacArthur '95 (entertainment).

Bucknell's football team hosts Brown in a showdown Saturday afternoon.The tailgate/lunch committee has organized a pregame tailgate luncheon for all alumni, parents, students and friends on Swartz Field under the tent. Mischa Blair '93 is chair of this committee.

The Bucknell Alumni Association Board of Directors will sponsor a reception on Swartz Field after the game. All alumni are invited to attend and enjoy the fun, food, and company.

There will also be many small gatherings of Alumni held throughout the weekend. According to Hoyt, Reunions are planned for the field hockey team, women's lacrosse team, the Class of '92, Sigma Chi class of '88 and Bucknell en France.

J.P. Morgan Recruits on Campus this Fall . . .

J.P. Morgan seeks undergraduates with potential to become part of the Morgan team that provides sophisticated financial services to to corporations, governments, and wealthy individuals throughout the world.

If you're interested, watch for recruiters from J.P. Morgan who will soon conduct information sessions on campus. Meanwhile, read on.

Career tracks at J.P. Morgan

Graduates start their career at J.P. Morgan in one of our rigorous career development programs, depending on their interests, skills and background. The programs are Corporate Finance, Global Markets, Global Technology and Operations, Management Services, Audit-Plus, and Masters in Accounting. Each program begins with intensive training programs before entering an initial career track.

- In Corporate Finance, you provide research, marketing, and analytical support to client and product teams. You work on a variety of projects that range from identifying a client's optimal capital structuring to structuring a stock or bond underwriting.
- In Global Markets, recruits enter one of three areas: 1) sales, where you use a thorough understanding of Morgan's investment and risk management products to solve client problems, 2) trading, where you manage risk positions and make markets in financial securities and instruments, and 3) research, where you develop essential analytical tools.
- In Global Technology and Operations, there are four career tracks including problem-solving in operations, design of applied technology, evaluation of leading edge computer and communications technologies, and product development with related sales and marketing responsibilities in our Securities, Trust, and Information Services group.
- In Management Services, the firm's internal consulting group, you address strategic management issues of the firm. Following training, Management Services analysts take assignments in project management, product development, account administration, marketing, human resources, financial planning market research, and other key support functions.
- In the Audit-Plus program following training, you may pursue an auditing career analyzing the multifaceted risks inherent in our business, or pursue a career as a financial professional, performing the accounting, analysis, and financial reporting of Morgan's results for senior management, regulators, and stockholders.

To be continued at an upcoming information session.

Do career opportunities still exist on Wall Street?

They do at J.P. Morgan, a world leader in global finance.

We offer exceptional career opportunities for the highly motivated graduate in corporate finance, sales, trading and research, global technology and operations, internal consulting, auditing and financial management.

You don't need an educational background in finance to succeed at J.P. Morgan. Successful candidates will receive extensive on-the-job training. This training includes specialized programs that help develop requisite business knowledge and technical skills, and introduce the ethics, culture and team orientation that distinguish our firm.

Attend our upcoming information session. Watch for the time and location on campus. J.P. Morgan & Co. Incorporated, 60 Wall Street, New York, NY 10260-0060.

Two weeks of madness come to an end

The first full rush in a year and a half came to a close on Saturday. The two week rush period culminated into a day of fun and frenzy. Early morning walkers could here the stereos begin to play as early as 9 a.m. Bid Day officially began at noon when fraternity pledges arrived at their respective houses in shirt and tie for a showdown with the brothers. Sorority sisters were seen by the dozens wandering to witness the spectacle before they gathered at Hunt Hall for their own festivities which began at 2 p.m. It was a day which was the result of long hours of meetings and tiresome small talk. Most, though, will say that it was worth it.

Clockwise from top: Delta Delta Delta sisters wander around watching the festivities; sorority rushees wait in the stairwell before they enter the suite s; Theta Chi brothers and pledges celebrate the day; a food fight can be great revenge but difficult to clean; Chi Phi pledges show their excitement over their bids; Sal Asta '94 plays a game of billiards during rush.

Dunlop's retirement ends an era

It can only be hoped that his successor and other new employees to the University are as committed

At the end of any great era there are feelings of sadness and excitement. The sadness stems from the sense of loss; the excitement from the prospect of what lies ahead. It is because of Dean John Dunlop's exemplary work over the last 26 years as Dean of Students that a sense of loss is felt and that the position is viewed as a positive one at all levels of the campus community.

As Dunlop departs he leaves an impressive legacy behind. Over the last quarter century, he has not only served the students, but also lived their lives with them. Day duties have extended into the evening hours on a weekly basis.

His commitment to the Bucknell Student Government and a host of other student organizations has promoted relations between the students and the adminstration. With Dean Dunlop's guidance, student leaders have learned the art of diplomacy and the ways of the administrative world.

He has also touched and changed for the better the lives of a countless number of students. As the University has moved from a regional to a national university, the students have become more diverse but so have the problems. Dean Dunlop has dealt with the new demographics and, at times, potential disasters. "Problem" students leave his office with a new attitude and appreciation of the administration.

No one can argue that his position was an easy one. He endured an oppressive social climate upon his arrival in the '60s, the turmoil and campus unrest associated with the Vietnam-era in the '70s. Finally he has seen the return to administrative regulation of the students in the '80s and '90s. Through his 26 years, however, he has never wavered in his committment to both the students and the university, as he provided fair and equitable solutions to difficult problems. His passion for the job has been matched only by the soundness of his administrative instincts.

No one will recognize and remember more names and faces this Homecoming than Dean Dunlop. Twenty-six years of reaching out to students in every corner of the university has made a difference in the majority of Bucknellians' college experience. More importantly, however, he elevated his position to one of respect; likewise, it is with the respect of the students, faculty and administrators that Dean Dunlop makes his exit from the Bucknell community.

We can only hope that Dean Dunlop's successor and any other new employees to the University will bring with them the calming and cooperative attitude that he takes with him when he departs, for it's people like Dean Dunlop that make Bucknell a place to which alumni want to return.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Student blasts Bucknellian for poor coverage

What is more important—ads, another feature story, or a tribute to the death of two classmates?

TO THE EDITOR:

It is with a great sense of hypocrisy that I find myself penning a letter to The Bucknellian. The anger with which I do so I can only hope to express in a brief letter. The Bucknellian is (and always has been) my least favorite publication on campus. Its wishy-washy, middle of the road views on anything from how to apply a band-aid on Tuesday to suggestions for dinner on Sunday are an insult to a collegiate atmosphere.

The September 11 edition angered me to the extent that I must invest time to communicate with this insignificant publication. The deaths of two young members of the Bucknell community transpired over the brief three months we spent on vacation. While the rest of us spent time lifeguarding in the sun, learning about Wall Street, and selling clothes, two beautiful young lives were lost. In most cases, one might assume that incidents like these might serve to bring the superficial brats that compose the majority of this campus to actually take time to think about the essence of their lives and the whole intangibility of existence.

Rather than give students that self-reflective opportunity, The Bucknellian devoted a space to the girls' memory that was so insignificant that it would better have served as an advertisement for the Market Street Deli. A few brief paragraphs, written by someone who probably didn't even know them, served to summate the loss of their lives. One was to graduate with me in May, the other attended both high school and college with me. I can guarantee you that their lives deserved a more appropriate and lengthy acknowledgment.

Were it merely the lack of recognition, I might be able to allow it to pass. However, this is the same issue in which I noticed larger articles on food, leisure, and, believe it or not, even how to do laundry, than were dedicated to the tragic loss of youth. If George Jenks deserved the front page for his unintelligible dribble on an issue as immature as fraternities, I believe these young women deserve it too. Death is forever ...

Hunter defends annual Hegins Labor Day pigeon shoot

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in response to the letter in last week's Bucknellian from Laura Yanne '76 concerning the annual Hegins Labor Day pigeon shoot. She portrays the event, a time-honored blue collar American tradition, as a ruthless slaughter of innocent creatures, and suggests that it be banned. As a hunter and a proud member of the National Rifle Association, I feel obliged to present the other side of the story.

Overpopulation of pigeons is a threat to public health in cities. When the shoot participants fire at the birds, their objective is not to put them through a great deal of pain, but rather to kill them quickly and humanely. The "trapper boys", who kill any wounded birds, serve to further the goal of ethical treatment of the game. Unlike the participants in the pigeon shoot, Ms. Yanne's concern for the birds is thoroughly misguided, as she prolonged the suffering of the wounded pigeon she found instead of having the courage to kill it mercifully.

Ms. Yanne is an elitist intellectual who does not respect the rights of her fellow Americans. She wants to impose her radical moral views on us instead of letting us make up our own minds. She despises the American culture, regards our traditions with hateful contempt, and blasphemes our sacred freedoms. She is an enemy of our nation and our way of life, and her Bamblist whining about the pigeons is only a cheap disguise.

Sophomore critiques the rush process

TO THE EDITOR:

I began the rush process three weeks ago, along with the majority of my fellow sophomore women. There was an intense energy that filled those hot, humid halls of Hunt; an electricity that passed from one woman to the next through our laughter, our smiles and our shared anxiety. We came together as a group, united through our common experience. We were all connected by our common goal to find what was right for us. My naive outlook on rush was one of happiness, friendliness and fairness.

I condemn not the Greek system itself. Everyone who began the rush process must have believed in the system in order to validate the time commitment. I sought the close friendships sororities promote, their philanthropy work and their involvement in school life and activities. Greek life at Bucknell opens a whole new door of activities and a new level of involvement. The Greek system at Bucknell is an important one and I, even more so as a sophomore, recognized this and wanted to be a part of it.

I am a survivor of the system, an official pledge in a sorority. Yet, many fell in the process, some by free will but many by necessity, as there was no other choice than to be an independent. For this, I blame the school. By use of the computerized rush system and its random cuts to trim down the numbers, the school turned the entire process into a game of chance. By instituting the pledge class quota of no more than thirty-six women, the school turned faces into numbers and excluded many caring and sincere people. The school turned what should be a very personal process into one that was inhuman.

Both the computerized system and the quota system were used by the school to try and cut down on the number of women involved in sororities; Bucknell is trying to de-emphasize the Greek system. However, I have found the opposite to be true. By cutting down on the number in each sorority, they have made an even more exclusive system whose positions are even more sought after than before.

This should be a happy period for me, as I wear my letters for the first time. It is not fair that I feel guilty and ashamed as friends and neighbors walk by in tears; The school does not see the pain in others' faces, but I do.

The school has broken those bonds we all held together in Hunt Hall three weeks ago. What remains in many women is anger and resentment: Everyone who wanted to find the right place for them did not. The school did not allow everyone who wanted to be involved in Greek life their chance. For something we waited so long for, Bucknell ended in crushing many sophomore women's self-confidence and self-worth.

I write this letter in hopes of showing the school the personal side of the sorority rush process, how their actions effected women's lives. I also send a plea to the administration that something must be done to give back these women's honor and dignity. Treatment of people in this manner can not be tolerated.

Student challenges Commerford to stay in Kress room

"They're really quite quaint! And when residents aren't in their room studying assiduously, or at the stadium cheering their bright, enthusiastic hearts out, they like to sit on this bench right here and contemplate the unadulterated beauty that is Bucknell University!"

Proud fathers nodded and grinned, embracing the day glow facade, occasionally swiveling to inspect a spandex-clad coed. Energetic mothers strolled most comfortably on the charming, green lawn, sometimes squeezing their husband's hand when the pedophillic perusal became a bit too obvious. Most of the young perspectives were ignoring Mom and Pop, paying close attention to the tour guide's schpiel and looking moderately confused at words like "assiduously" and "unadulterated." Obviously, these were the 50% who achieved less than 500 on their verbal scores.

"This campus looks mah-velous!" an exuberant dad joked heartily. His make-up blushing daughter cringed and adopted the standard, parent-denying "orphan" expression. A moment later, the Billy Crystal wannabe dropped a loving arm around his "little girl" and repeated the brilliant one-liner again, just in case anyone had missed it.

As the tour group pivoted around the neatly-trimmed bushes and out of sight, I stepped away from my Kress window. Enough delay. I rested my empty breakfast bowl of "Product 19" on the graffiti scratched desk, and grabbed a dry towel. Time for the quick Saturday morning shower—a Kress bathing experience that involves invigorating temperature fluctuations between freezing hot and burning cold.

"And, of course, it's better to look good than to feel good," I muttered as I twisted the nozzle, encouraging a trinkle or two of mercurial moisture to slop towards the floor. Gritting my teeth, I pivoted around the fungus-grungy curtain and out of sight.

Get the point, Commerford? What's that? No? You're too busy waving the white Mary Mac sheet of peace in front of feuding freshman roommates to pay any attention to esoteric parables? Well, let me spell it out for you then in a most non-esoteric fashion. Ready. Here goes— AS BUCKNELL SMUGLY WATERS THE LAWNS WITH "LEMON-TWISTED PERRIER" AND MOLDS THE SHRUBERY WITH "NEXUS SALON-STYLE SCULPTING MOUSSE," THE STUDENTS ARE BEING TREATED LIKE GENERIC "DIRT."

Oh, I know what your thinking. That I'm just another spoiled brat, expecting weekend breakfasts in bed and twice-a-day Swedish massages. As a matter of fact, in YOUR university days, YOU had to tromp three miles through fetid mounds of Brontosaurus excrement just to get to the Breyer's lowfat frozen yogurt. And today, those sniveling students bitch and moan about slightly scalding bath water. Oh, the humanity!

Well, Commerford, right here, right now, I'm calling your little bluff. Here's the deal. For one week you will have the unique privilege of residing in Kress Hall, room 228. You may have complete access to the radio, telephone, and Victoria's Secret Catalogues which adorn the accommodations. If you get hungry, there's plenty of tuna, granola bars, and Product 19 in the closet, completely free of charge. However, I am very possessive of my salad ingredients, and you will be billed extra for sampling any botanical supplements that may be found in a bottom desk drawer.

And, not to be overly Dickenson about all this, now that my room has been occupied, I would be more than happy to stay in your house. Or, if that would me too much trouble, there's a modest room in the Pineapple Inn that will suffice quite nicely. I'm not picky.

Now, here's the catch. After the guys on the hall take you out for a fun-filled night of frat-hopping and scoping freshman babes, and you have retired to your room for a saggy night's sleep, the next morning you MUST take a ten minute shower, monitored by a surly R.A. At Bucknell good-hygiene is a must, and the staff is no exception.If you can shower in Kress for one week and still maintain that there isn't a problem, I will dedicate a full column to the telling of your triumphant victory. Also, I will no longer moan or bitch as our maintenance staff pampers the trees with rare, designer sap and pumps the flowers with high-priced "Joe Weider Floral Protein Supplements," made by hand from bee pollen and python testicles.

If you fail in your endeavor, or more likely ignore this summons altogether, I will continue to introduce myself to potential tuition-payers (the ones whose parents drive sporty donation-hinting Jaguars) and congenially offer statements like, "Bucknell is a swell place to go! I'm so much happier now that my third-degree shower burns are healing up!"

So, in my effort to promote more fund-divvying sympathy for residence halls, there's the deal. Bucknell eagerly awaits your decision. By the way, if you do happen to stay in my room, and you do happen to get lucky, bring your own condoms. There's a conspicuous absence of dispensers in the laundry room.

STREET BEAT: What is your view on abortion?

BY TRACI MELLINGER '95

SHARON HONG '95
Sociology, Classiscs

"I agree that abortion is a moral issue. I feel that abortion is murder and I respect the life of the fetus. If people were more responsible about sex then abortion wouldn't be an issue."

ANDREW PINNENEKE '94
Civil Engineering

"Abortion is a non-issue, at least on a political level. A fetus is not able to survive outside the womb, and because this womb belongs to the woman it's her choice what is right or wrong for her body and life."

LAURA GILLESPIE '95
Biology

"I find it apalling that each year over two million individuals are denied the opportunity to impact on our world. We, as a society, place our interests before their inalienable right to life. Meanwhile, couples want desperately to adopt."

ED WHITE '94
Sociology

"I believe there is supposed to be a separation of church and state and therefore negate any religious tones to the question. I am for women's rights as well as the rights of every human being."

LAURA LANDSIEDEL '93
Animal Behavior

"A woman's choice to have an abortion can never be taken away. The only thing that will be taken away is the right to a legal, healthy medical practice."

MIKE MERLOE '94

"Abortion is not the issue. The issue is the limitation of alternatives. Once one limits alternatives, the limits is of thought."

Cap and Dagger storms into action

A look at what's happening in the campus theater group

Photos (clockwise from upper left): Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, and Valerie Marsden '93 celebrate a performance of The Crucible in the infamous greenroom. Located behind the University Theater in Coleman, the greenroom is the setting for all weekly Cap and Dagger meetings. George Hannah '93 starred in Open Admissions with Jill Emery '92 (not pictured) to premiere the Education Theatre Company (ETC) last fall. The cast of Speak Spanish for Me, (l to r) Gabe Portuondo '94, Bryan Clark '92, and Kristie Robson '95, performed at the Mid-Atlantic Theater Convention as part of the ETC. The play concluded with an open forum on ways to use theater in classrooms.

Students ready for busy year

BY NADINE KNOCHE

Cap and Dagger, now in existence for over 100 years, will continue its tradition of bringing cultural events to the Bucknell community. In addition to supporting the three mainstage performances presented by the department of theater and dance, and holding the annual student-directed cocktail theaters and Jan-plan plays, Cap and Dagger has several new events in the works.

This year marks the first year that the Educational Theater Company (ETC) will perform in full force throughout the campus and community. Dedicated to raising awareness about issues and people often neglected, such as people of color, dysfunctional families, and biculturality, the ETC will bring student directed pieces into classrooms and forums as a means of spurring discussion.

The ETC began on campus this past fall with a production of Open Admissions, a one-act play that raised issues concerning the open admission policies of inner city schools. Starring in Open Admissions were George Hannah '93 and Jill Emery '92.

In February of last year, guest playwright Bernardo Solano, along with the cast of his play Speak Spanish for Me, performed in Baltimore for the Mid-Atlantic Theater Convention. As a trial run for the ETC off campus, the cast and director presented the play and concluded with a forum on interracial and interclass issues. The effort was performed under the guidance of Professor Gary Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance.

This fall, the ETC will focus primarily on bringing short, student directed pieces into Bucknell classrooms. Already, several professors have expressed an interest in integrating the ETC with their lesson plans. The ETC will also provide opportunities for those students who are not involved in a mainstage production to continue improving their craft by giving them acting and directing opportunities.

In addition to the ETC, Cap and Dagger will bring several guest artists to campus. Acclaimed Shakespearean actress Claire Bloom will perform at the Weis Center in November and conduct workshops on campus. Renowned performance artist Meredith Monk will also hold a one-week residency in February. Cap and Dagger also hopes to continue its Alumni Guest Artist Series by bringing a Bucknell alumnus each semester to lead workshops in his or her specialty.

Although the probable abolition of the Jan-plan will make this the final season of student-directed January One-Acts, Cap and Dagger hopes to continue its Evening of One-Act plays this November. Cap and Dagger members are excited to bring a variety of opportunities to the Bucknell community as well as to strengthen their own talents during the upcoming year. Michele Firestone '93 and David B. Ames '93 will direct works by Sam Shepard in the department's last Jan-plan.

Meetings are held every Thursday in the University Theater at 5:30 p.m. All students are invited to attend.

Merging drama with classes

BY CHRISTY D'AMBROSIO

Members of Cap and Dagger, under the guidance of the department of theater and dance, are bringing a new and exciting source of instruction into classrooms–The Educational Theatre Company (ETC). Members of Cap and Dagger are asked to present theatrical performances in the form of staged readings that pertain to certain issues selected by professors and students. Professors, as well as students, can request for one of these staged readings in their classroom.

The ETC is hoping to reach all the different departments with this entertaining way of informing the students. Already, Cap and Dagger has been approached by faculty members from the english, biology, and management departments.

Professor Gary Grant, chair of the Theatre and Dance Department, put the ETC together as a technique to enhance classroom lectures with drama. Grant presented Speak Spanish for Me at the Mid-Atlantic Conference in Baltimore last year. Based on racial issues, Speak Spanish for Me was performed to show other schools how plays of this genre can facilitate classroom discussions. Grant also hoped this conference would encourage other schools in starting similar programs like the ETC. Nadine Knoche '93, president of Cap and Dagger and overseer of the ETC, hopes that the ETC will "open up educational possibilities and help people see how drama is an integral part of our society."

This semester, most of the departments are focusing on Native American issues. The Rez Sisters, which tells the story of Native American women trying to play bingo in North Dakota, will be performed in several classrooms. Also in conjunction with the forum, Janice Butler, director of the Women's Resource Center, is sponsoring Joy Harjo, a Native American poet who will be coming to Bucknell in October. To help students better understand her work, the ETC will be performing one of her screenplays a week preceding her visit. The ETC is also slated to present selected scenes from Shakespeare, a panorama of viewpoints on AIDS, and a piece on religion, in conjunction with the Reverend Boden, chaplain at Rooke Chapel. They can create scene simulations for management, biology, economics, education, religion, or other student groups.

Regular open forum discussions will also now be held after staged plays. The first one is October 24th, after The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs. September 27 auditions will be held for anyone interested in working with the ETC performances. Auditions will be at 7:00 p.m. in the University Theater in Coleman.

If interested in having the ETC come to one of your classrooms, please contact the Theatre and Dance Department (x1235). Submit any specific play or topic, as well as the date and time of the class. The ETC is, according to Grant, "lively, entertaining, as well as thought provoking."

Jazz legend to perform at Weis

Grammy Award-winning jazz keyboardist Chick Corea, with his Akoustic Band + One, will grace the Weis Center stage tomorrow night in one of the highlight events of the season.

Corea hails from an extraordinary background. He has been a successful jazz figure since the release of his solo piano albums in the 1970's. Recognized for his improvisations and compositions, Corea is marked as one of the first keyboardists to recognize the potential of synthesizers, and has since worked in electric and acoustic formats. During his three-decade career he has easily moved among many different jazz styles.

Throughout his career, Corea has compiled an impressive resume, working with some of the greatest legends of jazz, including Stan Getz, Sarah Vaughan, and Miles Davis. His recordings with his group Return To Forever, and performances with his bands Elektrik and Akoustic, have earned him world recognition as well. Presently Corea is playing with top European and American jazz musicians.

William Boswell, director of cultural events at Bucknell, is grateful for the opportunity to book a musician as prolific as Corea. Boswell states, "We were very lucky to be able to take advantage of this window in Corea's frantic recording schedule to get him here. It should be an evening of pure magic." Also appearing with Corea will be renowned saxophonist Bob Berg, an equally legendary jazz musician. The performance will begin at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $20 ($10 with B.U. ID), and may be purchased from the Weis Center Box Office.

Photos by Terry Wild

Bucknell Hall hosts Mary and Barry Hannigan this Tuesday night in a free concert of works for the piano and flute. The concert will start at 8 p.m.

Pianist Barry Hannigan, professor of music, claims the concert "leans toward Romantic music and includes a little bit of everything." Hannigan adds, the concert will range from "some Japanese music by Fukushima to virtuoso variations for the flute." Included in the performance will be the premiere of "Rhapsody," a piece written for the couple by Jackson Hill, professor of music.

Barry Hannigan hails from a prolific background. A widely acclaimed pianist, Hannigan has performed in the United States and Europe. Making his New York debut at Carnegie Recital Hall in 1984, Hannigan went on to make his European debut at the Edvard Munch Museum in Oslo, Norway. He has received a doctorate in piano performance from the Eastman School of Music and is on the faculty of the Rocky Ridge Music Center, Bucknell, Susquehanna, and Dickinson Universities.

Mary Hannigan likewise holds an impressive resume. With degrees from both Colorado College and Rutgers University, Hannigan is a member of the Harrisburg Symphony and the Columbine Duo.

Topics for the 1993 "Elie Wiesel Prize in Ethics" Essay Contest have been announced by the Elie Wiesel Foundations for Humanity. Senior undergraduates are eligible to compete for awards totaling $10,000 in the annual, nationwide contest.

Students are encouraged to enter original essays responding to one of the following topics: "The Meaning of Ethics Today: Choices, Challenges and Changes," "What is the Ethical Legacy of the 20th Century?" or "Can Ethics Be Taught?"

Essays must be submitted on behalf of a student by their college or university, by December 30. Only three essays will be accepted from each school. A distinguished panel of judges will determine the winners. Recipients of First, Second, and Third prizes will be guests of the Foundation at an award presentation ceremony held in New York City.

Elie Wiesel established the Foundation for Humanity after receiving the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986. The Foundation's purpose is to advance the cause of peace and human rights by creating forums for discussions of ethical issues confronting people throughout the world.

The "Elie Wiesel Prize in Ethics" Essay Contest is made possible by a major grant to the Foundation for Humanity by E. Billie Ivry of New York, with additional funding provided by the Thaler Family Foundation of Chicago.

Detailed information about the contest can be obtained from Dean John Pyper, 113 Marts Hall. Bucknell entries must be submitted to Dean Pyper no later than Monday, November 30.

Students dig Tunesia in summer heat

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Unlike the Indiana Jones movies, archeology is not packed full of exciting thrills and chills as one races through an underground maze, trying to steal ancient relics away from natives. Instead, it involves greuling hot days in the summer sun, carefully picking through a small square of earth, hoping, but maybe not expecting, to find anything worthwhile.

Quite often, much time and energy is wasted on an unproductive site. Occasionally, however, as Maria Glod '93, Larry Larsen '93 and Megen Karakelian '93 discovered in Tunesia, the dig does indeed prove successful. These three students and Janet Jones, professor of classics, attended a summer dig in the North African city of Tunesia, at the archeological site which was the ancient Roman city of Carthage.

"In the early 1980's a bulldozer uncovered a broken statue at the location which was to become our archeological site," remarked classics major Glod. "Researchers from the University of Georgia went there in 1990 to begin the first dig, and our group of 24 students and professors from colleges across the United States made this the second. We were there from June 16 until July 30," Glod commented. "And our group stayed at a house located about 20 minutes from the site. Because the temperature was above 100 degrees the entire time, work began at 5 a.m. every weekday morning. The site was divided into four squares with a team assigned to each one. We began the day's work by brushing away any dust that might have settled during the night and taking some morning photos of everything within each square. We got a break at nine-thirty, but by one o'clock we had finished our work for the day." By the end of the dig, the group had uncovered the missing legs and base of that statue uncovered by the bulldozer, much ancient Roman glassware. They had also determined that the site was a necropolis, a Roman burial ground.

Top: It is easy to forget the scorching heat and grueling work at an excavation site. Bottom: The rewards of a succesful dig.

Glod, who received a Knight Fellowship to work on this dig, noted, "I was going to apply for the project regardless of whether I received the fellowship or not." Glod and Jones are now developing a research report which will probably be ready for publication in January.

Said Karakelian, "It was such an amazing experience that opened up for me the whole idea of archeology as a career. I am not sure how solid of a career it would be for me personally, but if I have the time I'd love to go back on another dig." Karakelian added, "Archeology was always something that I was interested in, and it was interesting to learn what real archeologists do. The other people we worked with were so down to earth too. . . I guess you can't really be pretentious if you're willing to sit in the dirt and sweat for hours. We were treated like real archeologists, not just students. It was a really great educational experience.

As for the cultural aspect of the trip," Karakelian commented, "It is just so different, and the natives didn't speak much English. The languages spoke there are Arabic and French. I do speak some French and that helped some, but we communicated with the Tunesians who were working on the dig with us mostly by using gestures."

"It was just such an excellent cultural and educational experience," Karakelian continued. "I met some really wonderful people, and I saw some of the most beautiful things. We would watch the sun rise over the hill every morning, and during a storm one night, we sat on the roof and watched as the lightning moved across the sky. It was very powerful." Glod added, "I think that I got something out of every single aspect of the trip."

What the health is going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI
Bucknellian Staff Writers

At one time or another, everyone has experienced a severe headache that was due to stress, fatigue or other unavoidable nuisances. Those who have experienced a migraine headache, however, know how truly excruciating pain feels. So, what is the difference between a serious headache and a migraine?

The technical term for a migraine headache is called scotomata, or an altering of the vision. According to Dr. Stechschulte, Medical Director of Bucknell Student Medical Services, there may be a blind spot, or a haziness similar to "looking through water or a bent crystal, which engulfs your entire visual field. Afterwards, [this] aura stops and the headache persists."

Migraines are thought to start from a vesso-spasm, which is a constriction of a blood vessel in the brain, thus bringing out the aura. Such spasms may be triggered by things like chocolate, caffeine, nitroglycerine, red wine, aged cheese, and the nitrates found in packaged meats. They can also be caused by fatigue, hunger, or stress, and affect twice as many women as men because of estrogen-related conditions (i.e., menstrual cycles, birth control, pregnancy, and estrogen replacement therapy in postmenopausal women).

This year, several students have been diagnosed as experiencing migraines, and the number of people who experience migraines seem to be increasing, especially in young adults. Possible causes for this increase are television, artificial foods and colorings, pesticides and herbicides on fruits and vegetables, and milk allergies. Migraine headaches can also be due to tension, which seems to be the case with most of the students at Bucknell. Such headaches start from a pain in the back of the neck or head and are frequently caused by sitting in front of a computer or doing things which keep muscles contracted for long periods of time. Even a simple activity such as writing at a desk is more physiologically relaxing than sitting hunched over a keyboard.

Migraines actually begin with a "pre-headache" phase, which includes the aura, and is typically brief; the actual headache then occurs, due to the swelling of the blood vessels both inside and outside the surface of the brain (possibly triggered by the neurochemical elements mentioned above). Such pain usually lasts longer, and is usually unilateral, affecting one side of the head more than the other. People suffering such headaches usually need to eliminate all aggravating stimuli by going into a dark, quiet room and relaxing.

However, headaches, while strongly associated with migraines, are not the only symptom, nor are they indicative of a migraine. Many times migraines are diagnosed due to symptoms such as dizziness, nausea, or visual deficiency. Other symptoms include photophobia (sensitivity to light), loss of appetite, and hyperactive irritability. Furthermore, migraines are genetically transmitted and treatable with certain drugs, such as ergotamine, a member of the same family as LSD. A vasoconstrictor, this drug involves a risk benefit, as common side effects include lack of oxygen to the brain and a potential stroke.

While such drug therapy is extreme, there are methods, which, when used in conjunction with an understanding of the particular cause of a patient's migraines, can help alleviate the pain. According to Dr. Roger Cady M.D., Medical Director of the Shealy Institute for Comprehensive Health Care, in Springfield, Missouri, "Migraines are underdiagnosed and undertreated. Doctors often see a headache as an acute event, not an ongoing chronic illness." For this reason, people who suffer recurring headaches are encouraged to keep a "headache diary", and take note of when their headaches seem to occur and the severity associated with such events.

Headaches are also one of the most common reasons for people to miss work and school, and should therefore be investigated if they occur frequently or severely. Students should keep in mind that eliminating stressful stimuli does help alleviate some of the pain associated with migraine headaches. However, if the pain is too severe or debilitating, you should see a doctor, because you don't necessarily have to have a headache to experience a migraine.

We've come a long way, Bucknell

50 years ago at Bucknell

•The regimentation of tradition will fall upon the male members of the class of '46 Monday morning at 6 a.m., when this year's freshmen rules go into effect. All freshmen men are to wear dinks, black ties, and black socks. (This rule goes out of effect every Saturday night at 6 p.m. and does not become active again until the following Monday morning at 6 a.m.) Freshmen men are expected to know all the verses of Bucknell's alma mater, and be ready to sing them upon request. Freshmen are never to cut campus, but must stay on the regular college paths. No freshmen will walk on the Senior path. (This is the path which starts at Taylor Hall and extends to the Vaughan Literature Building.) Freshmen men must not date to any varsity contest, but must sit as a compact body, and serve as a nucleus for the cheering section. Friendliness, speaking to everyone, etc., will be expected of freshmen at all times. The manners and etiquette of freshmen will be very scrupulously noted and checked by upperclassmen during the next month. Freshmen are to wear cardboard signs on their backs with their names and college addresses written in large legible letters on them from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m. during rushing week. All the preceding rules will be enforced by the Bucknell Senior Tribunal, in any way they may see fit. This body will meet every Monday night. All freshmen are expected to be in their rooms at 9 p.m. every Monday night, and are not to leave their respective dormitories until the following morning.

•One hundred fifty-two of the 235 men enrolled in the Freshman class have been bid to the fraternities of Bucknell, according to the fraternity preferential lists issued yesterday from the office of Paul Hightower, adviser of the Interfraternity Council. Sigma Alpha Epsilon and Sigma Chi led the fraternities in the total number of returns, having 25 men on their lists. Phi Kappa Psi was a close third with 24 men, and Lambda Chi Alpha, last year's leader, was fourth with 22.

•Dr. John P. Dunlop, who has assumed his duties as dean of men, is looking forward to a "new experience professionally." Prior to his present position, Dunlop worked and was educated in public institutions, and he believes that working in a private university will offer new opportunities.

•Sigma Alpha Epsilon is back. After one year, of a two year suspension, the University's chapter of SAE—known as Pennsylvania Zeta—has been reopened. SAE was closed by the national organization in June of 1966 at the request of University officers, after a series of incidents culminating when a number of brothers broke windows by heaving beer barrels through them at Houseparty Weekend the month before.

•Dionne Warwick, famed popular singer, will appear at Davis Gym tomorrow at 8:45 p.m. Miss Warwick has toured extensively in Europe as well as the United States.

Local eatery draws Bucknellians

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Locals and students alike gather at Bechtel's for a bit of old fashioned food and tradition.

If you're a Bucknellian, you've been to. . .

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Do you have a hankering for a home-style meal? Are you hungry for grub that has been a part of a long-standing Bucknell tradition? If so, sidle down to Bechtel's on Route 15, plant yourself on a swivel stool at the soda fountain, and experience a part of Bucknell nostalgia.

Bechtel's, a family run business, made its debut in 1923 when brothers Donald and Lott Bechtel began catering milk and other dairy products to Lewisburg residents by a horse-drawn milk cart. The Bechtel brothers owned and operated a local dairy farm, and expanded the business to include an ice cream parlour and soup and sandwich shop on Market Street in the early 1930's. In 1931, the Bechtels bought the present location on Route 15 and built a plant for milk processing and ice cream production.

The Bechtels opened the restaurant on Route 15 in 1955. Though they no longer processed their own milk, the brothers continued using local farmers to supply milk for their famous homemade ice cream.

Edwin Bechtel, son of Donald Bechtel, opened the Frosty Cow in the summer of 1991, fulfilling his dream of adding the soft-serve ice cream industry to the Bechtel business endeavors.

Today, Bechtel's is run by Edwin Bechtel's wife, Judy Bechtel, and daughter, Susan Bechtel. Despite the passage of time and the changing trends in the restaurant industry, Bechtel's has managed to hold firm the traditional atmosphere and menu that made them famous among Bucknellians and Lewisburg residents. The walls are adorned with photos of the two founding brothers, numerous portraits of jersey cows, and pictures of the evolution of Bechtel's.

Featuring a host of 38 ice cream flavors such as Pretzel Delight (vanilla ice cream with chocolate covered pretzels), Tin Roof (vanilla ice cream with chocolate syrup and chocolate covered peanuts) and Cherry Garden (vanilla ice cream with cherries, pineapple and coconut chunks), Bechtel's ice cream counter is complete with all the necessary paraphernalia (including a Soda Jerk), making it a genuine soda fountain of yesteryear and a vital part of Bechtel's notoriety at Bucknell.

The Bechtel's menu boasts dishes that would make grandma proud, with meals that range from char-broiled ham steak and honey dipt chicken, to cream cheese and olive sandwiches and jello salad. "Our homemade beef vegetable soup and chili are the traditional favorites of students that we continue to serve," said Sharon Booth, manager of Bechtel's. "We still try to stick to the home-style foods, which includes a lot of Pennsylvania Dutch style cooking." added Booth added, "We have never gotten into the 'fad foods' like Mexican or Chinese."

Bucknellians have long been a part of the Bechtel's tradition. "Bucknell is very much a part of our business," Booth noted. "A big weekend on campus means a big weekend here." Booth, a 25-year employee at Bechtel's, recalled a Bucknell student who religiously frequented Bechtel's. "One girl came in almost every day of her four years at Bucknell and ordered a Peanut Butter Fudge ice cream cone. She still drops by every now and then," mused Booth.

The Sigma Chi Fraternity has attempted to continue its own special tradition at Bechtel's. At Homecoming several years ago, the rather large jersey cow that stood proudly in front of the restaurant mysteriously disappeared. The mystery was solved when the cow showed up during the parade down Market Street on the Sigma Chi float. The cow was returned, but replaced on top of the restaurant to prevent future 'liberations.' Two years ago, the brothers of Sigma Chi asked the owners if they could borrow the Bechtel's cow, once again, for their float. Not wanting to stand in the way of the tradition, the owner's allowed the temporary removal of the jersey. noted Denis Maguire '93, "as long as we put the cow back on top of the building. It was a difficult task."

Whether you need an ice cream fix, or have strange craving for home cooking the way it used to be, Bechtel's is the place for a Bucknellian.

Female engineers inherit grant

Writer and U.S. ambassador wills grant to benefit women in the sciences

BY ALISA BLAND AND COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Bucknell's chemical engineering department is the recipient of a new $427,852 five-year grant established by the Clare Boothe Luce fund. Under the grant, Darlene Schuster, visiting assistant professor of chemical engineering, was named a Clare Boothe Luce professor for the next five years. In addition, the Luce Fund award provides for two scholarships. The scholarships, valued at $12,500 each, will be awarded to two female chemical engineers for two years, starting the 1993-94 school term.

The Luce chair is named for the late Clare Boothe Luce, a writer and former ambassador to Italy. A spokesman for the Henry Luce Foundation, which administers the Clare Boothe Luce fund, said that when she died in 1987, she left $70 million in her will to establish grants for women in science and engineering because she believed women were underrepresented in those fields.

Henry Luce III, chairman and chief executive officer of the Henry Luce Foundation, Inc., said in a letter to President Sojka announcing the award, "We are delighted that Bucknell University is now one of our partners in this program to encourage women in science and engineering."

As the only female chemical engineering professor at Bucknell, Schuster's presence is felt throughout the engineering department. Schuster has been a visiting professor at Bucknell since 1989. Before her career at Bucknell, she was a research engineer for Chevron Oil Field Research Company in La Habra, California, and a senior engineer for Gulf Oil Production Research Company in Houston, Texas. Schuster received her bachelor's degree and Ph.D. in chemical engineering from West Virginia University and earned her master's degree from the University of Pittsburgh.

Though the grant is new and not widely known, the general feeling toward the grant is positive. "This prestigious and highly visible chair will do much to encourage more women at Bucknell and beyond to pursue careers in engineering," President Sojka said.

Several students agreed with Sojka, noting the need for more aid to women in engineering. "This will benefit many female chemical engineers. Most opportunities in this field are geared toward men," said chemical engineer Kristy Schiano '95. Chemical engineer Christy McCallum '95 felt that the scholarship was an excellent idea "to help women pursue their goals in a field that has been traditionally male-dominated." Scott Reddig '93, agreed, noting the need to get women involved. "However, it would also be nice to have a scholarship available to anyone, male or female, who needs it," Reddig continued.

Specific details, such as who will grant the scholarship and whether it will be need or ability-based are still undetermined. Further information regarding the scholarship will be made available to female engineers later in the year. Until then, contact Jim Rice in the Office of Alumni Relations.

Bison fade out against Towson 24-21

Woefully insufficient kicking game nullifies offensive thunder below the Mason-Dixon line

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Bucknell faces off against Bloomsburg in a hard-hitting game earlier this season where they notched their first victory of the young season. The Bison will meet Brown tomorrow at the stadium at 1:00 p.m..

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

When doesn't it matter when Bucknell racks up 501 total yards of offense, including a career-high 353 passing yards by quarterback Travis Kopp '95?

When the Bison lose the game to Towson State, 24-21, that's when. Despite the second largest passing day in Bucknell history, the Bison wasted many scoring opportunities and blew a 21-10 second-half lead last Saturday night in Towson, Md.

After Towson State took a 7-0 lead just 1:06 into the contest, Kopp rallied the Bison by tossing a pair of touchdown passes, one to Joe Vargo '93 out of the backfield, and one to his tight end Mark Gentile '95. Bucknell led the Tigers, who finished 1-10 in 1991, by a count of 14-7 at the half.

A Towson State field goal on the opening drive of the third quarter cut into the Bison lead, but they would get the points back later in the quarter. Bucknell cornerback Duane Hart '94 picked off a Dan Crowley pass at the Towson State 30 yard line, and the Bison were back in business.

The drive was seemingly destined to go for naught, however, as after three plays the Bison had actually lost two yards. But on fourth down, Kopp found his favorite receiver, Whitey Berardinelli '93, wide open for a touchdown. The 21-10 score would not only be short-lived, but so would Bucknell's lead.

To begin the rally, Crowley found Mark Orlando for a 44-yard touchdown pass less than two minutes later. Then, in the fourth quarter, Purdue transfer Tony Vinson broke three tackles before high-stepping into the end zone for a 25-yard score. Suddenly, the Bison trailed 24-21.

> "We're very win-hungry right now. To get close is in some ways more difficult than getting whacked."

After one drive per team that ended in punts, Kopp had just over three minutes left to work some magic. The sophomore showed great poise in completing eight of 11 passes while driving the Bison to the Towson State 34-yard line. Unfortunately for Kopp, some ineffective time management left only four ticks on the clock—time for just one more play. When his Hail Mary attempt fell to the turf, it signaled a disappointing loss for Bucknell.

Head coach Lou Maranzana was obviously displeased following the game. "Basically we didn't make enough plays," said Maranzana. "We had spots where we did very well and spots where we didn't do anything."

The biggest key in the game was missed opportunities by Bucknell, as the Orange and Blue was only able to put points on the board twice in five trips inside the Towson State 20-yard line. Once again, furthermore, the complete lack of a kicking game killed them. Eric Hacker '95, who earlier in the contest had an extra point blocked, missed a 20-yard field goal in the second quarter. Later, with the Bison leading 21-17 in the fourth quarter, they had a critical fourth down play at the Towson State 11-yard line. Maranzana, showing no confidence in his kicker, decided to pass up a field goal attempt that could have given the Bison a seven-point lead, and called for a passing play on fourth down. The scoring opportunity was wasted, however, when Kopp's pass to Berardinelli was off the mark.

The performances by Kopp and Berardinelli were among the best in Bucknell history, and these two have been doing it all year. Kopp has completed 65.7 percent of his passes in his three games this season, and he has only been intercepted once. He has an efficiency rating of 160.3, which places him tenth in the nation among Division 1-AA quarterbacks.

Berardinelli caught nine passes on Saturday for 184 yards, both career-highs. The 184-yard day marks the fifth-most productive day by a receiver in Bucknell history.

Tomorrow's homecoming affair against Brown (0-1) will be an interesting game, as both teams have to look at this meeting as a rare opportunity to win a football game. Bucknell, who blew one such opportunity last week, will likely be overmatched in all but one or two games after tomorrow.

Brown, who returns just five starters from last year's 1-9 season (the team's lone win was over pathetic Columbia in the last game of the year) is coming off of a 22-17 loss to Yale last Saturday. However, they do have some offensive players who could test the Bison's struggling defense. Senior quarterback Bill Pienias had a fine day against Yale, completing 16 of 24 passes for 261 yards and two touchdowns. Their other weapon is senior running back Brett Brown, who ran for 821 yards last year.

"It's frustrating," said Maranzana, speaking of the Towson State loss and the season in general. "We're very win-hungry right now. To get close is in some ways more difficult than getting whacked."

The Bison, who have won only four homecoming games since 1972, will be looking to boost their own spirits, as well as their coach's, as another three-game road trip follows tomorrow's game.

OF THE WEEK

In honor of this weekend's homecoming festivities, the editors present a classic independent (skin)-Greek (shirts) hardwood clash from the spring semester of 1992. As most Bucknellians are aware, these confrontations often get quite political and are thus laden with flying elbows; this fact was not lost on The Bucknellian's alert photographer, who managed to snap off this historic shot from a safe distance away and then fled for his life amidst the action. Legend has it that this particular game ended in an hour-long debate regarding whether house or cafeteria food was better.

Men's soccer limps through .500 week

Without leading scorer, Greg Beatty '95, Bison upset by lowly Holy Cross, edge out Millersville to push record to 4-2; 0-2 in league play

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The best thing to be said for this week in Bucknell men's soccer is that it is over. After an upset loss to woefully overmatched Holy Cross, and a narrow margin of victory over Millersville by a score of 2-1, the Bison must seriously re-evaluate their play thus far if they are to contend at all this year in the Patriot League. Bucknell now sports a respectable 4-2 overall record, but it is a forgettable 0-2 in Patriot League competition.

The Bison were playing this week without the full-time services of their leading scorer, Greg Beatty'95, who injured his left knee last week against Susquehanna, and has seen minimal playing time since. And while one player, or the absence of one player, cannot make or break a team's success, Bucknell sorely missed Beatty's scoring punch up front, as the team put in only one goal in the two games since his injury. Beatty is currently ranked seventh in the Mid-Atlantic Region in overall scoring.

Saturday, in its second Patriot League match of the year, Bucknell helped to make history against Holy Cross. Unfortunately, that feat involved the Bison giving the Crusaders their first Patriot League win ever, 1-0. "We had a sluggish first half," said Coach Reynolds of the devastating defeat. "We gave up a goal early on and just didn't get it back. We had opportunities. We held the play most of the second half. It was a disappointing loss."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

A Kutztown defender battles with midfielder Leon Hayduchok '94 during Bucknell's second win of the season.

The only goal of the game came in the 38th minute, and the Bison simply could not recover. It was a disappointing result, not only because of the consequences in the league, but also because it seriously hampered any momentum the Bison may have been building from their 8-0 win over Susquehanna last week.

Reynolds was not very pleased with the officiating, but he says that a team "can't expect to get the benefit of the doubt when you're on the road."

Holy Cross was winless going in to its game with the Bison, and had been outscored 8-1 by its opponents.

Wednesday night's win over Millersville is one the Bison will gladly accept, but in truth the better team, at least that night, left the field the loser. Bucknell played deplorably both offensively and defensively, and it cost the team dearly in the early going.

In the thirteenth minute, mass confusion on the part of the Bucknell defense led to a goal for Millersville, a screaming shot that left keeper Mark Wrigley'94 with no chance. Reynolds said of the goal, "When we make mistakes, the ball always seems to finds its way into the back of the net."

Entering Wednesday's action, Wrigley was ranked second in the Mid-Atlantic Region with a goals against average of only 1.11.

The Bison survived a scare in the fifteenth minute, shortly after the Millersville goal. Pressing for the equalizing score, Rich Shaheen '95 sprinted into the penalty area after a long through ball. Shaheen and Peter Yovino, the Millersville keeper, reached the ball at the same time, both sliding to reach it first. Shaheen's cleated foot found Yovino's stomach, and both men lay still on the ground thereafter, Shaheen having possibly twisted his knee. After a few very tense minutes, though, both men were back on their feet were able to finish the game.

Despite their overall poor play, the Bison managed to tie the score before halftime. With only 42 seconds remaining in the half, Leon Hayduchok'94 crossed the ball in to Scott Tardibuono'93, who headed the ball strongly past a defenseless Millersville keeper. Tardibuono, to this point only a spot player for the Bison, has returned generous dividends for the squad in the time he has received. He has been working hard for Bucknell, and at this pace, Coach Reynolds says that "he's going to be seeing more [playing] time."

In the second half, the Bison played better soccer, but they continued to make fundamental errors more commonly witnessed at an intramural match. As it turned out to be good enough.

But barely.

In the 73rd minute, after a melee in front of the Millersville goal mouth, the ball popped out to Hayduchok, who was waiting just outside the penalty area.

Hayduchok proceeded to let fly a magnificent shot that sailed past a diving Millerville keeper, who was frozen on the goal line. The Bison managed to hold off a Millersville attack in the closing minutes to win a ball game that came dangerously close to slipping away.

Saturday, the Bison host Patriot League rival Colgate. Reynolds says of the upcoming match, "[Colgate is] playing real good team ball," commented Reynolds. "We can't afford any more losses [in the league]. We have to do the little things[in order to be competitive]."

Colgate sports an overall record this year of 3-2-1, but they are 2-0 in league competition, and are currently in first place.

Baird McIlvain '95 is seen here bringing the ball upfield in a home game last week. He has helped to anchor a defense that has recorded two shutouts in six games this season for Bucknell.

BUCKNELL'S AMERICAN GLADIATOR

BY PETER A. LALOS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Who says Bucknell athletics aren't a stepping stone to professional competition? Certainly not Jennifer Walz '89.

Walz, a first team Academic All-American from 1987-1989 for Bucknell's women's basketball team, was recently chosen to compete on the "American Gladiators" television series. The former Bison hoopster scored a handful of victories in shows that are scheduled to air on September 26, October 24, and November 14.

Originally from Berkeley Heights, NJ, Walz is Bucknell's all-time leader in points scored (2,112) and scoring average (19.0 ppg.) and had her number retired in January 1990.

Starting tomorrow, Bucknellians will be waiting to see if Walz can survive the hulking foes and obstacle courses of the TV world's newest athletic extravaganza. Check local listings for time and station information.

Field hockey shut out by Holy Cross, #5 UMass

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

There's no place like home.

The Bucknell field hockey team returned to Lewisburg yesterday for its first home game in over two weeks, and it was a welcome one indeed. "We're happy to be home," said coach Heather Lewis. The Bison (2-3) spent last weekend in Massachussetts for their league opener against Holy Cross and a contest with the undefeated University of Massachusetts (5-0).

On Saturday, Bucknell lost a 1-0 decision to Holy Cross.

"Since it was our league opener," said Lewis, "we were disappointed [about losing]. Holy Cross scored its goal as a result of a defensive breakdown—It really wasn't a spectacular offensive play." The Bison again had trouble putting the ball into the net as they accumulated only ten shots on goal and forced the opposing goal keeper to make only five saves. "We missed a wide open goal cage that could have tied the game," said Lewis. In addition, Holy Cross played a great possession game. "They did a good job of using the entire field," said Lewis. The Bison had to quickly put this game behind them, since they were to play fifth-ranked Massachussetts on Sunday.

The Bucknell team was both "nervous and excited" to play UMASS, according to Lewis. She worked with the UMASS team through this past spring, and she said that "they were much better than I thought they would be." Lewis put them on the Bison schedule this season because "it's important to play against the best to see how the best is played. I wanted to see how they'd respond and what they would learn. They learned a lot." It took a few days for the players to rebound from their 6-0 loss in which they were outshot 24-12, but they "put UMASS in the file, and that was it," said coach Lewis. "I told them not to be concerned with who we're playing—just go out and play. Don't sit back on your heels regardless of what's on the scoreboard."

At one point, coach Lewis even turned to the fans and asked, "Who can score a goal? Can you guys score a goal?"

Indeed, the Bison did go out and play yesterday against the Ursinus Bears (3-3) in front of a fairly sizeable group of Bucknell fans. The first period was scoreless, but Ursinus dominated the half. The ball spent much of the first half in Bucknell's end of the field, but the Bears could not score. Shooting woes for the Bison continued as the team struggled for shots. At one point, coach Lewis even turned to the fans and asked, "Who can score a goal? Can you guys score a goal?"

The Bison then took control of the second period when Almira Baldwin '94 scored her third goal of the season 1:35 into the half, unassisted after some great moves in front of the goal. Baldwin struck again three minutes later, but the goal was called back after a late offsides whistle. The intensity picked up as Bucknell kept the shots coming, twenty-one in all. At the 9:56 mark of the half, Liz Goodall '96 scored the Bison's second goal off of a Katrina Mueller '94 assist. Minutes later, an Ursinus goal was nullified because of another offsides call, but the Bears got their sole goal of the contest with just under seven minutes remaining, making the score 2-1. Bucknell held off Ursinus for the remainder of the game, and the Bison ended the game with a three-shot barrage of their own to win by a final score of 2-1.

Bucknell returns to league play this Sunday, playing at 10th-ranked Lafayette (3-1). The Leopards are winners of both league championships since the Patriot League was formed in 1990.

retired in 1974 as a vice president of Black and Decker after 36 years in the portable power tool industry and died in 1988 in Saratoga, Ca.

Kucera, who set Bucknell season records for receptions (73) and receiving yards (1,029) in 1984 when he was named to the Associated Press All-America Second Team, ranks second to Tom Mitchell on the career lists with 144 catches for 1,980 yards. A four-year letterman, he also had 15 career touchdown receptions and set a school career record of 465 punt return yards while averaging 11.6 yards per return.

An honorable mention All-American in 1983, Kucera set a school record (since broken) with seven touchdown catches in 1983, was first in the East and fourth nationally among 1-AA players with 7.3 receptions per game in 1984, and ranks sixth on Bucknell's career list with 3,065 all-purpose yards despite missing nearly an entire season because of injuries.

Co-Most Valuable Player of the 1984 Bison team and recipient of the Christy Mathewson Award as the Outstanding Athlete in his class, Kucera came to Bucknell from Downingtown (Pa.) High School, was a Dean's List student majoring in art and received an NCAA Postgraduate Scholarship. He is currently owner of David Kucera, Inc. in Brooklyn, N.Y.

A three-year starter at point guard, Seneca played on Bison basketball teams that had a combined 58-31 record, won two ECC regular season championships, and earned a first round NCAA Tournament berth opposite Georgetown by winning the 1987 ECC Tournament.

Co-captain of the Bison as a senior, he was named to the All-ECC First Team in 1986 and 1987, was on the ECC All-Rookie and All-Tournament teams in 1985, and was Most Valuable Player in the ECC Tournament in 1987. Seneca, who came to Bucknell from Penn Hills High School in Pittsburgh, set season (193) and career (553) assist records, holds season and career records for assist averages, graduated as the tenth leading scorer in school history (1,022 points), and was the first player in Bucknell history with over 500 assists and 1,000 points. He currently resides in Pittsburgh and is employed by Kauffman's department store.

The inductees will also be honored during halftime of tomorrow's football game against Brown.

David Kucera '84, an honorable mention All-American in 1983, is currently ranked sixth on BU's career list for all-purpose yards.

Usage for Bucknell West playing fields reassigned

The opening of several new playing fields in the area west of Route 15 has resulted in a reassigning, by the Department of Athletics and Recreation, of field use for the fall semester. The following are the various field assignments:

Fields A and B: Restricted to use by the varsity field hockey team.
Field C: Restricted to use by the varsity baseball team.
Field D: Restricted to use by the varsity softball team and men's varsity soccer team.
Field E: Restricted to use by the varsity men's lacrosse team.
Field F: Restricted to use by the women's varsity soccer team.
Fields 1, 5, 6 and 7: For use by club and intramural teams.
Fields 2, 3 and 4: For use by intramural teams.

All numbered fields are open for recreational use when they are not scheduled for either club or intramural activities.

Assignment of fields other than those restricted for varsity team use will be made by the Office of Intramurals/Recreation and/or by the assistant to the athletic director for facilities.

Field assignment will be posted on the new schedule board located on the side of the psychology lab. When the fields are too soft or wet to be used, a red flag will be raised above the schedule board to indicate that the fields may not be used for intramurals, clubs or general recreation.

A green flag will indicate that the fields are OK to use as scheduled.

win over Samantha Shaw: "Sam played the style of tennis I love to play against." Anhood played a tough second set, but could not rally and lost 1-6, 4-6 to Kristen Farmer. This was Anhood's first loss of the season in singles play.

Two of the three doubles matches were suspended because of darkness. Both Bucknell doubles teams were leading when their respective matches were called. Weihl and Allen dominated the last set to win, however, 6-2, 6-1. "We probably played our best match of the season together," said Allen.

Despite the fact that most of the players had never competed in four matches in one day, the women's tennis team was able to win 5-2. As Anhood said afterward, "Even though playing two matches in one day was extremely fatiguing, I think this was a big confidence boost for the whole team."

'Wimpy' Bucknell has the right idea on college sports

BY CHRIS COBBS

The answer is Bucknell. Now here's the question: Where should Arizona State look for an idea of how to do college football and basketball?

There are ways to do chicken, ways to do transmissions and ways to do college sports.

This place operates on the quaint premise that college is for learning. Everything else is second, including the almighty buck.

If the sight of athletes running amok gives you the dry heaves, consider Bucknell's way. This place operates on the quaint premise that college is for learning. Everything else is second, including the almighty buck.

Granted, Bucknell is generally regarded as a wimp on the NCAA playing fields. Even the name suggests a bunch of geeks in horn-rim glasses burrowing into a library.

Bucknell, located about an hour's drive from Joe Paterno in rural Pennsylvania, is too lowly to even make the Bottom 10.

It doesn't draw crowds of 70,000 or pay a coach more than a tenured professor. Its player wear wiggins not Nikes. Bucknell is a school with no athletic scholarships, no palatial athletic dorms, no redshirt players, no seven-figure TV deals. The buck stops here.

Check the lineup of your favorite NFL or NBA team. Not likely you'll find a Bucknell grad there.

Now check the police lineup. Not likely you'll find a Bucknell player there, either.

Where you will find Bucknell players is lining up for diplomas. In fact, Bucknell leads the NCAA with its 94 percent graduation rate. And Bucknell players take only 4.1 years to graduate. No basket-weaving classes, either.

The Bucknell basketball team went 21-9 last year, barely missing the NCAA tournament, but the school is just as proud of other numbers. Like the average SAT score of 1,200 for student-athletes. At some schools, you'd need two jocks and a tutor to get 1,200.

It costs $21,000 a year to attend Bucknell. No one gets a full ride based on his time in the 40-yard dash. Scholarships are based on need—the student's, not the football team's.

If a minority student gets $19,000 in financial aid, he's expected to work part time to make up the balance. No, we're not making this up.

"The minute that you make winning games the top priority is the same minute that all your standards go down the tubes," Athletic Director Rick Hartzell said. "It's that simple."

That doesn't mean Bucknell accepts losing. Hardly. The basketball team is more than respectable and wrestling often cracks the top 25.

"We are regionally competitive in all we do and nationally competitive in a few sports," Hartzell said.

"And that's good enough for us. We don't need a national championship to be successful. Everybody is at peace with that approach."

There's the rub. No one with an interest in ASU athletics is going to be at peace with fielding a bunch of nerds. No one at Ohio State, Alabama, Texas A&M or 100 other schools, either.

"Excellence is expected here," Hartzell said. "Nobody majors in eligibility. If you do, you will have problems with your coach, your professors and me."

Bucknell recruits carefully but is not exempt from real-world problems.

A few years ago, a dozen Bucknell football players got in a fight at a fraternity house. But the athletic department didn't intervene. Instead, the campus judicial system handled the problem.

Now check the police lineup. Not likely you'll find a Bucknell player there, either.

Several players were suspended or expelled, but all eventually returned to finish their degrees.

The key point here is that the football coach isn't under intense pressure to keep his job by going 11-0 and landing a bowl invitation. He doesn't have to bend rules to get marginal players in school, keep them eligible or make outlandish demands on their time.

Bucknell went 1-9 last year and no one wanted to fire the football coach. Bucknell won its opener this year, but if it loses the next nine, the coach will be safe, because Hartzell and alums are satisfied the team is doing its best.

"Not every place can be like Bucknell, but every place can put less emphasis on winning and making money," Hartzell said.

"Put more priority on educating than just graduating kids. You can have high graduation rates without teaching them much. Until that is the priority, it will never be good enough."

ASU is never going to be confused with Bucknell, but it wouldn't hurt to give it the old college try.

So have hope, my disillusioned friend. All will be well with our beloved game. And remember, it is a game. Played on the field, of course.

Lisa Gibbons '95

Women's soccer forward Lisa Gibbons '95 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of September 25 following another outstanding offensive display against Holy Cross. The 1991 Patriot League Rookie of the Year scored one goal and assisted another in Bucknell's 3-0 defeat of the Crusaders, and has led the Bison in points in all of their six games.

Gibbons also leads the Patriot League in goals (eight) and assists (four), and is Bucknell's all-time leader in scoring.

Lisa Gibbons '95 continues scoring streak; Kim Fekel '93 posts second shutout in 1992

BY BILL BROWN AND T.K. DRAPER
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Despite wasting four prime opportunities to score in the first half, Bucknell's resilient women's soccer team recorded its fourth win last Saturday, shutting out visiting Holy Cross 3-0. Bucknell goalkeeper Kim Fekel '93 received credit for her second shutout of the season as Bucknell avenged the 5-0 humiliation it suffered at the hands of the Crusaders in 1991.

Bucknell head coach Toby Lovecchio was pleased with the consistent effort his Bison displayed, especially since there was an obvious lack of hustle in the team's last loss against league rival Lehigh on September 12. "That was the best game we have played all year," Lovecchio commented, referring to Bucknell's suppression of Holy Cross. "They gave 110% effort for 90 minutes."

Stephanie Ruggiero '96 scored Bucknell's first goal with ten minutes remaining before halftime. Bucknell made a slow shot at the goal, and the Holy Cross goalkeeper charged the ball but bobbled it when faced with the pressure applied by the hustling Bison forward Lisa Gibbons '95. Ruggiero seized this golden opportunity, quickly kicking the ball into the empty net for her second goal of the season.

After the victory, Lovecchio had high praise for Ruggiero. "She did a nice job coming off the bench. Her goal came at a critical time. The goal came about because of Lisa Gibbons' pressure on the goalkeeper—Steph was at the right place at the right time."

Nevertheless, Bucknell fumbled away numerous opportunities to score in the first half.

At 19:40, Kerry McDonnell '96 made a perfect pass, setting up Gibbons for a ten-yard shot that was intercepted by the Holy Cross goalkeeper.

Two minutes later, Gibbons received a free kick from the right side of the goal. Holy Cross quickly formed a human shield between Gibbons and the goal, and her shot sailed high over the net.

Later, a brilliant series of passes culminating with Gibbons heading the ball toward the net was squandered. During the exchange, Joanne Crane '95 passed to McDonnell, who was able to place her pass near Gibbons' head. Unfortunately, the sophomore headed the ball out of bounds.

With 2:38 left before the end of the first half, another free kick—this time by McDonnell—ended in denial when the ball flew over the crossbar.

As a consequence, Bucknell entered the second half with only a 1-0 advantage. The Bison changed this situation, though, when Gibbons scored from ten yards out with 21:41 remaining in the game.

With a Holy Cross forward sprinting toward her, Fekel made a fabulous sliding save fourteen seconds after Gibbons had pushed Bucknell's lead to a more comfortable margin of 2-0.

The final goal for the Bison came courtesy of a mental breakdown on the part of the Holy Cross goalkeeper, who had apparently been growing increasingly frustrated as the Crusaders fell further behind.

Midfielder Clare Herdman '95 challenges a Holy Cross opponent in Bucknell's game against the Crusaders this past week in Lewisburg.

Bucknell's Jennifer Giordano '95 had a direct kick in the middle of the field 45 yards from the goal and, while her shot flew over the wall that Holy Cross had created, the end result didn't do much to buoy the opposing goalie's spirits. The Crusader netminder carelessly mishandled the ball, allowing it to roll into the corner of the goal.

"The game was won because all 11 players played 90 minutes of solid defense," explained Lovecchio. "We had a lot of intensity and we came out ready to play."

Water polo wins three at EWPL games

A Bison polo player leads the charge, as the team has jumped out to a 3-0 start in impressive fashion. The team defeated St. Francis, George Washington, and M.I.T. in their first three games. The squad will compete at home October 17-18 as it hosts the Mid-Atlantic League games.

BY MATT ZARTMAN

The men's water polo team opened its 1992 season last weekend on an up note as it traveled to Army to compete in the Eastern Waterpolo Games.

The Bison came away with victories against St. Francis (12-5), George Washington (17-8), and MIT (19-10) to begin the year with a perfect 3-0 record.

First year coach John Zeigler '91 said that he was very pleased that Bucknell's men were "able to dominate these easier teams." He added that his men "played very well defensively which led to us counter-attacking and scoring."

The fourth match played over this past weekend was against the University of Richmond, and it seemed to be well in hand as the Bison had a solid three-goal lead with three minutes remaining. Richmond was able to tie the match, however, and force an overtime period where it went on to hand Bucknell its first loss of the season by the score of 10-9.

Following the frustrating defeat, the Bison stood at 3-1 on the year.

"We played well up to where there were three minutes left," Zeigler later explained. "We should have just put the game away." Nevertheless, he added that "this weekend was a good warm-up period. Everyone got a lot of playing time."

Sean Tierney '95 had an exceptional week, leading the team in goals in three of the four games played and averaging four goals in each match. Although he was disappointed with the loss to Richmond, he said that "we played well together, and with a lot of continuity." Regarding last weekend's play, Tierney went on to comment that it "really helped us simply because we were able to get out and play before we face our tougher opponents. Our team consists of a lot of freshmen, and it was good that they had this weekend to play so that they will know what to expect throughout the season." Tim Nesvig '96 is one of the many freshmen on the team, and he played beyond his years in going on a six-goal rampage against George Washington.

As part of this weekend's homecoming events, the Bison will play an alumni game against returning graduates tomorrow morning. The match is set for an 11 a.m. start at the Freas-Rooke swimming pool in Davis Gym.

Looking ahead to the weekend of October 17-18, the water polo team will have a rare home match as it hosts the Mid-Atlantic League games. Some of the Bison's toughest opponents will compete in these games, as Bucknell will by then be in the heart of its 1992 schedule.

ML baseball's future bright—believe it or not

So you say you are a little disgusted about major league baseball these days. Our great national pastime has gone down the toilet, you say. Oh sure, you have some pretty good reasons why. Players' salaries are out of hand. Your two month's salary now applies to taking your family to a ballgame as well as wedding rings. The commissioner was essentially overthrown by the owners. The great San Francisco Giants are moving— to a dome no less. We still can't get this designated hitter thing straightened out. Your reasons go on and on.

Well as far as I'm concerned, you can just stop your whining. Baseball is a game meant to be played on the field — the Camden Yards, Fenway Parks, and Yankee Stadiums — not in the courtrooms. In case you haven't noticed, the ballparks are still lit, the games are still going on. And they're better than ever, as far as I'm concerned.

Although the pennant races have stretched out in all four divisions over the past week or so, the competition has been heated all year. My favorite team, the Baltimore Orioles, have given me my share of thrills and disappointments this year. But at least the disappointments have come as a result of the play on the field. When the Orioles most productive hitter, Mike Devereaux, popped out with the bases loaded and the O's down by a run the other night, I was devastated. But that's what our great game is all about.

And what about the future? A future that you say will be marred by lockouts and lawsuits. Baseball will survive them. It has gutted out such problems throughout its history, and it always comes back with renewed strength. As far as I'm concerned, baseball's cup is half full, and the future is bright.

Many teams have a lot to look forward to. Organizations such as Cleveland, the New York Yankees, and Montreal all appear to have bright futures. In fact, one could argue that if the season were to start over right now with 162 games to play, none of the four teams leading their respective divisions would win it again. The Milwaukee Brewers, Chicago White Sox, Montreal Expos, and San Diego Padres would be good bets to go to the postseason.

At least three teams — Texas, Cleveland, and Milwaukee — will have new stadiums in the next few years. And what about the expansion teams? Sure we'll watch them get whipped for awhile, but let's appreciate watching the evolution of these teams. Despite my loyal hatred for the Toronto Blue Jays, it has been remarkable watching them go from 100-game losers to 100-game winners over the last decade. And more recently, the Atlanta Braves and Pittsburgh Pirates have built themselves into the powers of the National League.

The success of these small market-teams — Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Milwaukee, etc. — is wonderful for the state of the game. You see, baseball, like any other economic system, is self-correcting. Organizations will look at how these teams have rebuilt from within. They will look at how the Dodgers and Mets of the world have shelled out the bucks in the free-agent market, and they will see where it's gotten them.

Sure, the superstars like Ryne Sandberg

Bison tennis remains unbeaten

Bucknell's only perfect team doubles up on Lafayette and Lehigh in the span of 24 hours, moves to 5-0

BY DAN TARDITI

After relatively easy victories over Lehigh and Lafayette, the women's tennis team finished its second week of the season with another perfect record, raising its mark to an imposing 5-0 (3-0 in the Patriot League). The team was originally scheduled to play the Lehigh Engineers on Saturday and a second match against Lafayette on Sunday, but coach Rose Ewan boldly decided to play both matches on the same day. This meant that some players had to play up to four times within twenty-four hours and, as Julia Diaz '95 later attested, "After the fourth match, I was exhausted, totally exhausted."

Following the 7-2 win over Lehigh, team captain Kymm Carlson '94 said of playing consecutive matches for the first time ever, "I had never played two matches in a row. I think it was really smart of Coach (Ewan) to do this, because if we can get through two matches, then we can play one match with no problem. I was really impressed with our team's concentration and focus through both matches." Carlson won the first match 6-3, 6-4 over Lehigh's Sheri Rosenburg, which she felt helped her get out of a slump that had recently been plaguing her. This set the tone for her doubles match as well, with Carlson and Diaz dominating 6-3, 6-0. Carlson said that she and Diaz expected a harder match. They had lost to Fordham as doubles partners before, but this time the twosome, as Carlson said, "picked it up and won."

> "I was really impressed with our team's concentration and focus through both matches."
> -Team captain Kymm Carlson '94

Diaz, Bucknell's number one seed, lost a tough match 2-6, 3-6 to Lehigh's 1991 number two seed. "My forehand wasn't good and my timing was off," explained Diaz. "This sort of made me feel uncomfortable the rest of the match. I wasn't really hitting the ball—I was hesitant, and just sort of pushed it over." Other winners were Kristina Lutter '95, who rallied from one set behind to capture the win 3-6, 6-1, 6-3 over Jen Mozek. The rest of the way the women's singles dominated, winning all the rest of their matches in straight sets. Lauren Weihl '96 led a parade of successful Bison singles players in winning easily 6-0, 6-2 over Dara Plasky. Once again the freshman duo of Sara Allen '96 (6-3, 6-3) and Erika Anhood '96 (6-3, 6-1) won in straight sets in relatively simple fashion.

In other doubles action, Weihl and Allen captured a hard-fought second set to win 6-3, 7-6. Lutter and Christine McMillan '95 lost a tough match to Lehigh's 3rd doubles team 2-6, 2-6.

Not more than twenty minutes after its match at Lehigh, the Bison traveled to Lafayette and began their first match. Facing a worn-out Bucknell crew should have given a distinct advantage to the Leopards, but Lafayette was also unfortunate enough to have played a match earlier in the day against Colgate. Diaz used some of the momentum that she had gained in her doubles win to take a tight match over Erin McKoul, 7-6, 7-5. "I was psyched," Julia said, and attributed her success in the second match to being more aggressive. "I had a whole different attitude—I believed that losing by hitting was better than just pushing the ball over and winning." Lutter won easily 6-3, 6-2 over Lafayette's Tracy Gold. Carlson lost a close match to Laurie Abelson 5-7, 6-7.

For the junior from Weston, Ct., this match presented a strange twist of fate. "I always played Laurie throughout high school and I never lost, but she just played the big points better," commented Carlson. "She basically outsteadied me on the big points." Weihl won a difficult second set to triumph over Shanna Paston 6-3, 7-5.

Elsewhere, Allen enjoyed her 6-3, 6-3

William "Bud" Wilkinson '36 will always be remembered for catching the first touchdown in BU's victory over the University of Miami in the first-ever Orange Bowl in 1935.

The new members are football and track and field standout William (Bud) Wilkinson of the Class of 1936; the late John (Jack) Dempsey, a 1934 graduate and All-America tackle in 1933; David Kucera, a second team All-America wide receiver in 1984; and Chris Seneca, a two-time All-East Coast Conference basketball guard who led the Bison against Georgetown in the 1987 NCAA Tournament.

A three-year football letterman, Wilkinson caught a 23-yard pass for Bucknell's first touchdown in the inaugural Orange Bowl Game on January 1, 1935, a 26-0 victory over the University of Miami. Earlier that season he caught a 56-yard pass from Joe Reznichak to set up the Bison's first score in a 13-7 win over Penn State, and he scored both touchdowns on passes from Reznichak in a 13-7 win over Washington & Jefferson, then a leading team in the East.

Also one of Bucknell's leading scorers in track and field, Wilkinson captained the 1936 team, was the first Bucknell sprinter to break ten seconds for 100 yards, and at one time held school records for 100 and 220 yards. A central Pennsylvania intercollegiate sprint champion, he won the 100, 220 and 440-yard dashes and was second in the shot put and javelin in a dual meet with Bloomsburg in 1934. As a junior he ran on two winning mile relay quartets at the Penn Relays.

Retired from E. I. duPont deNemours & Co. and living in Seaford, Delaware, Wilkinson came to Bucknell from Riverside, New Jersey, and in 1976 was inducted into the Burlington County (NJ) Track and Field Hall of Fame. After graduation from Bucknell he was offered a professional football contract by the Boston Redskins, but turned it down to accept a position as an accountant. A year later the Redskins moved to Washington and won the National Football League championship.

A native of Scranton and graduate of Ridley Park (Pa.) High School, Dempsey was named a tackle on the All-Players' All-American team selected for Liberty magazine in 1933. That unit also included such standouts as Joe Skladany of Pitt, Francis Wistert of Michigan, Beattie Feathers of Tennessee, George Sauer of Nebraska and Aaron Rosenberg and Cotton Warburton of Southern California.

A member of Carl Snavely-coached teams that had a combined 17-6-4 record, Dempsey played in 1930 on the first-ever undefeated (7-0) Bucknell freshman football team, and he is the sixth starter on the 1933 Bison team to be elected to the Hall of Fame. The others are linemen George (Butch) Boiston, Owen (Jeff) James and Nick Farina, quarterback John Sitarsky and halfback Eddie Myers. Snavely, the head coach of the team, and his assistant, Max Reed, are also members of the Hall of Fame. Following graduation Dempsey played from 1934 to 1937 with the Pittsburgh Steelers and Philadelphia Eagles.

Chris Seneca '87, point guard, helped to lead the Breakin' Bison into their first NCAA tournament in which they squared off against the Georgetown Hoyas.

Bucknellians observe Columbian quincentennial

Contrasting views of New World conquest challenge traditional conceptions

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It was five hundred years ago that the Nina, the Pinta and the Santa Maria set sail for the New World. This fall, several departments within the Bucknell community are collaborating to offer their own series of productions commemorating this historical event.

The commemoration of the Columbian Quincentennial celebrates 500 years of European presence in the Americas, but also brings attention to issues of the invasion and conquest of an entire race of people and the country they called home.

Although school children first learn of Columbus as the father of the New World, scholars' views on the explorer now range from depicting him as the patriarch of Western civilization to the progenitor of all our current ills.

For the purpose of educating the campus community on the many views of Columbus' historic discovery, the religion department received a major grant from the Pitcairn-Crabbe Foundation of Pittsburgh to sponsor a two-year series of lectures, workshops, conferences and exhibits. The grant was developed by Professors John Grim and William Becker.

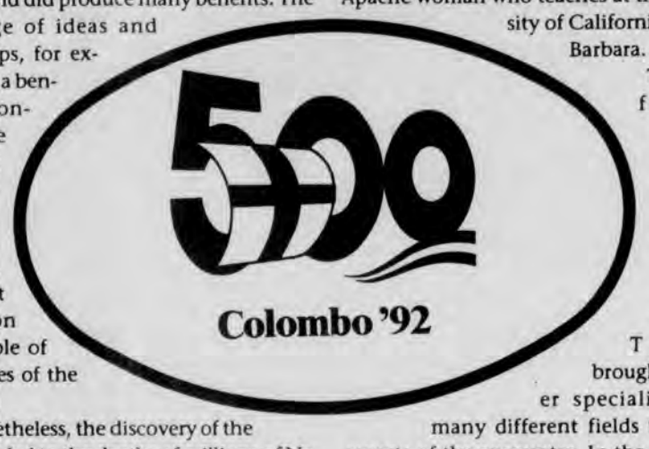
Professors John Peeler, Political Science, and Bonni Poteet, Modern Languages, of the Latin American Studies program have also been preparing for this celebration for several years. They received a grant from the Pennsylvania Humanities Council that has enabled them to present exhibits, performers and guest speakers to the community as part of the program's commemorative series.

"This is an opportunity for students, faculty, administration and staff to think about the historical forces engendered at the early Encounter period which are still powerful, formative influences on our lives," said Grim.

"Now, we realize that indigenous peoples are not part of the 'them' but of the 'we.' Together, we will confront the need for cultural values, environmental concern and social justice."

Acknowleding the quincentennial as "an important event that's worth celebrating," Peeler pointed to the need to remember both its positive and negative aspects. He said that the conquest of the New World was not so much a celebration as it is an "ambiguous event with both good and bad consequences."

The merging of the Old World with the New World did produce many benefits. The exchange of ideas and food crops, for example, is a beneficial consequence of this merger that has had permanent effects on the people of both sides of the Atlantic.



Nonetheless, the discovery of the Americas led to the deaths of millions of Native Americans by diseases and wars and the destruction of irreplacable natural resources. As Professor Grim observed, "The impact of the encounter on Native American society, culture, and religion has been so profound that their survival into the present is a tribute to their resiliance."

Not all the blame for the negative consequences of the founding of the New World can be placed on Columbus' shoulders, however. "It would be simplistic to blame Columbus," Peeler said, "but it is important not to glorify him, either."

Peeler remarked that Columbus was, paradoxically, both a typical and an extraordinary man. He was typical of his times in that he subscribed to the popular concern of the fifteenth century, which was finding gold in the New World and establishing a substantial income through the trading markets.

Columbus merged this materialistic motivation with a religious one: as Christianity was an integral part of his life, Columbus believed that he would be spreading the word of Christ to the ignorant "savages" of the Americas.

The religion department's quincentennial program, directed by John Grim, began last fall with a lecture by Lawrence Sullivan, the director for the Center for the Study of World Religions at Harvard and a specialist in religions of the Americas. This was followed by a talk by Inez Talamantez, an Apache woman who teaches at the University of California at Santa Barbara.

Two conferences were also held at Bucknell in the spring and fall terms. These brought together specialists from many different fields to discuss aspects of the encounter. In the summer a workshop was held for 25 high school teachers and concentrated on ways to integrate Native American history, culture, literature and religion into existing components of high school curricula.

The Latin American Studies program, under the direction of Peeler and Poteet, began their commemorative series last spring when artists Montejo and Toqui Amaru, a musical group from Austin, Texas, performed on campus.

The series continues into the fall with presentations from two premier specialists of the Latin American field. One of the highlights of the "Voices From Latin America" series is a visit from celebrated Mexican novelist, essayist and diplomat Carlos Fuentes, who will offer three presentations to the campus during his visit. Fuentes will give a reading in English and Spanish in Bucknell Hall on October 5; he will participate in an open forum on "Dialogue in the Twentieth Century on October 6; and will orate the keynote quincentennial address, entitled "The Buried Mirror: 500 Years After Columbus" also on October 6 in the Weis Center.

Claribel Alegria, Salvadorian poet and novelist, will be on campus October 14 and 15 to offer a trinity of presentations. She will present a lecture on Latin American art on October 14; an open forum on women and literature in Latin America on October 15; and an afternoon reading session in English and Spanish also on October 15. The most current event on the schedule is an exhibit on display in the Langone Center Cave entitled "Image of the New World."

An exhibit has also been curated by Professor Grim with the assistance of the Gallery Theater and Cyndi Peltier, Assistant to the Director of the theater. Titled "Sand, Skin, Paint, and Metal: A Visual Exploration of Cross-Cultural Encounters in North America" is on display in the Center Gallery on the third floor of the Langone Center until November 1.

"Sand, Skin, Paint, and Metal" is the first in a series of four exhibits that will be on display throughout the academic year. The purpose of these exhibits, according to Peltier, is "to fit into the agenda for common learning and to expand on the curriculum in a visual way."

The current exhibit is a celebration of Native American tradition and iconography. According to Peltier, the colonists and the government acted shamefully toward Native Americans for many years, but this Gallery show explores cross-cultural influences in terms of aesthetics. "Native tradition is now held up," Peltier said, "instead of being squelched" or pushed aside.

The show has been extraordinarily successful, Peltier commented, because it is drawing students from both the University and local high schools. The show is meant to provide visual aid to instructors, especially those whose classes are concerned with the history, culture or aesthetics of the Native American way of life.

"Images of New World" displayed

BY MEG RICHARD

"A paradise lost" is the glorified term Europeans gave to their hopes of the New World before it had been discovered.

In commemoration of the Quincentennial of Columbus's voyage to America, the Latin American Studies Program has put on display a series of more than 70 reproductions of maps, engravings and woodcuts dating from 1482 through the end of the 17th century.

By Jody Foss—The Bucknellian

This series represents a chronological advancement of Europeans in the New World and reflects the conflictive attitude held by many scholars regarding the conquest of the New World.

Designed by Arnaldo Lopez and LaVonne Poteet, the exhibit entitled "Image of the New World" begins with history from the fourteenth and fifteenth century and traces the changes in the European community up through the 17th century.

The maps and drawings unveil such images as cannibalism, mythical beasts, and the pain of slavery. The exhibit weaves together a tapestry of images of the "new" lands and peoples.

The exhibit is on display in the Langone Center Cave until Oct. 16, daily from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m.

Professors will be permitted to schedule classes in the Cave during this period.

Computer Services renovates system

Coleman Macintosh Lab will now be utilized as a classroom for computer instruction

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The staff of Bucknell's Computer Services have many responsibilities, ranging from protecting campus terminals from destructive viruses to installing microcomputers into dormitories.

The tasks that staff perform every day stem from what Director Jon Eschinger identifies as their three main objectives: to make technical services suitable for faculty instruction, to provide adequate learning facilities for students, and to support campus research by making information easily and conveniently accessible.

The staff has fulfilled its responsibilities in each of these areas this summer as they renovated computer laboratories, upgraded systems to higher capacities, and have made access to information faster, easier and more user-friendly.

The most visible change students will notice is in the Macintosh lab in Coleman Hall. Computer services remodeled the area, Eschinger said, so that it is more suitable for instructional purposes.

Improvements include a color projection system that enables the instructor to complete an exercise on a computer while his students are watching the process on a larger screen.

There are fewer terminals in the room than last year so that the room is less crowded. The goal was to provide a more comfortable and accessible environment that ultimately utilized the space available.

"I think the whole idea behind the changes is to make computer services more beneficial to students."
—Tim Lesher '94, Computer Services Student Consultant

Terminals in the library have been moved inside the main library as a result of the relocation of Media Services into the old 24-hour section.

Eschinger noted that there are the same number of terminals as in past years and the 24-hour opportunities are still available.

New, more powerful Macintosh terminals were purchased for Dana 233 and the corridor connecting Dana with the Computer Center. The computers that had been in these rooms were moved to labs in the basement of Hunt Hall, Smith Hall, and the Roser Gateway.

Memory has been increased in IBM and Macintosh computers campus-wide, Eschinger said, so that they can run the latest software equipment.

By Jody Foss—The Bucknellian
Students often find computer labs crowded and discover that there are no computers available for use during crunch periods.

Engineering and mathematics students, for example, can benefit from a software package called "Mathematica."

This package features graphic representations of geometric, trigonometric, or other mathematical equations so that the screen will display the area under a curve, for example, or any other problem with which the student is working.

For research purposes, students or faculty may access the newly-installed "DECsystem 5000," also called "Coral," which replaced the older and slower "VAX 780 and 750" systems.

This system is divided into two main sections. The first section is primarily used to run statistical analyses of large data bases for research in the social science, economic or mathematical fields. It also houses files for individual departments, such as history or sociology.

Coral's other section fully supports the campus' electronic mail server, called Eudora.

Computer Services has been offering informative short courses in how to use "E-mail." For protective purposes, anyone wishing to access this convenience must have a "logon" number, available through Computer Services.

Eschinger noted that Bucknell has considered their purchasing options and have economized wherever possible.

Poll reveals students' election preferences

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Student preferences in the presidential race between George Bush and Bill Clinton are too close to call based on the results of a Bucknellian poll, conducted Sept. 28-29. Of the 118 students polled, fifty seven (48.3%) said they favored Bush, 56 (47.5%) said they favored Clinton, and five (4.2%) were undecided. None of the responsdents indicated that they would vote for Perot. However, when asked how they would vote if Perot re-entered the race as an active candidate, 20.3% of those polled said they would vote for Perot.

Bush still held the lead with 38.1% with Clinton close behind with 37.3% and 4.2% still undecided. Perot announced his active candidacy on Thursday, after the poll was taken. Sixty-one percent of those polled said they did not think Perot should re-enter the race.

The poll revealed some interesting voting behaviors. Men favored Bush by 7.2%, and women favored Clinton by 4.8%. However, first year women favored Bush two-to-one over Clinton. The class of 1996 favored Bush by 30.8% over Clinton, while the classes of 1995, 1994, and 1993 favored Clinton by 9.8%, 36.8%, and 17.6% respectively.

Of those polled, 91.5% said that they were registered to vote. Rita Moser, Elections Clerk and Chief Registrar for the Union County Courthouse, said that those who are not registered may do so by returning a voter registration form to the Courthouse by Monday at 4:30.

According to Moser, forms are available around campus, at the post office, and at the Courthouse. However, said Moser, "Those who register will have to do so in Union County," since the forms could not be sent away and processed due to Monday's deadline.

Moser said that this is not a problem, and that many Bucknell students register in Union County rather than at home.

Those students who are registered in their home towns can vote using an absentee ballot.

According to Judy Anderson, Voter Chairperson for the League of Women Voters, "this process is confusing to some students."

"If the students have received something in the mail it is probably only an application," said Anderson.

This application must be completed and sent back to the place of registration.

The courthouse "will verify that the person is indeed a registered voter and send a ballot," said Anderson.

The poll between Bush and Clinton has a 9.2% margin of error, and the one including Perot has an 8.75% margin of error, according to Carmen Acuna, Professor of Mathematics.

The reason for the large margin of error, according to Acuna, is the fact that the closeness of the results makes it harder to accurately predict the winner.

Furthermore, the randomness of the poll was partially compromised since 70% of the respondents were from the classes of 1996, and 1995. Pollsters polled the first five students that were home from each page of the Bucknell Student Directory.

Editor's Note: The poll was conducted by The Bucknellian election coverage team which is comprised of Brian Eng, David Hecht, Deb Hildebrandt, Samantha Schivers, Christina Tisa, and Meg Wickman. There will be one more student poll before the election.

Friday, September 25

At 10:25 a.m., a custodial supervisor reported several acts of vandalism to lounge furniture in Swartz Hall. Unknown person(s) did slash two couches and a chair with a sharp instrument, causing over $150.00 in damages. A custodial supervisor reported that a movie screen in Coleman Hall was also slashed. An estimate of damages is unavailable at this time.

Some time between September 24 at 5 p.m. and 11 a.m. on September 25 an AC adaptor was stolen from the Library Macintosh laboratory.

Officers responded to the soccer fields at Bucknell West for a reported knee injury. Upon arrival, the victim stated that he had injured his knee while playing soccer. He declined any medical assistance and signed a waiver to that effect.

At 8:10 p.m. officers responded to Swartz Hall, C wing, for a reported fire alarm activation. Upon arrival officers found that someone did activate a pull station for no apparent reason. Pull station and alarm were reset.

At 7:54 p.m. Public Safety officers observed a group of males mud sliding on the Academic Quad. The officers determined the males were from a fraternity and notified the fraternity president that if any damages were done, the fraternity will be held liable.

Saturday, September 26

Public Safety officers responded to a reported disturbance at the Gateways at 2:12 a.m. Residents of one apartment did say that individuals were yelling and did break the living room window of their apartment. Investigation into the matter is underway.

Sunday, September 27

At 2:37 a.m., a faculty member reported a theft of two postors from the ground floor hallway of the Olin Science building. Postors were moved sometime between 11:20 p.m. and 2:39 a.m. Stolen postors were valued at approximately $25.00.

At 2:40 a.m. Public Safety officers observed four individuals on a golf cart in the lower Harris parking lot. Individuals fled the cart upon sight of patrol vehicle. Cart was held at the Public Safety office until it could be returned to the golf course.

Monday, September 28

Public Safety officers responded 9:30 a.m. to Hunt Hall for a fire alarm activation. Upon arrival officers discovered that there had been a small fire on a stove, extinguished by a custodian. Investigation revealed that a plastic container was ignited when unknown individual(s) turned on the wrong burner.

Tuesday, September 29

At 12:15 a.m. Public Safety officers responded to Kress Hall on the report of an ill student. Student was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital by a student health service driver for treatment. The student was released later that same day.

Wednesday, September 30

Public Safety officers responded to a medical alert at 11:36 a.m. in Hunt Hall on the report of a female in need of medical attention. Victim was transported to Evangelical Community Hospital for treatment by the William Cameron Ambulance Company.

Thursday, October 1

At 9:40 a.m. Public Safety officers responded to a report of vehicle damage in the farm parking lot. Upon investigation it was determined that a vehicle parked beside the damaged car had caused the minor damage to the passenger door of the victim's car. A license check was conducted and the owner of the vehicle was contacted and will settle with the victim.

has noticed that normally no more than 30 Microsoft Excel programs are in use at the same time.

Instead of buying 400 Excel programs (one for each terminal on campus) the University purchased only 30 programs and supplementarily installed KeyServer, which makes accessing Excel and other "shared" applications easier and faster.

The Excel program in both the Macintosh and IBM computers has been upgraded to version 4.0; Microsoft Word has been upgraded from 4.0 to 5.0; Microsoft Word for Windows has been upgraded to 2.0; and Windows on the IBM has been upgraded to 3.1.

These are the "latest versions with all the 'neat' changes," Eschinger said. Students and faculty utilizing the new systems should find the technology more convenient, expedient, and sophisticated.

"I think the whole idea behind the changes is to make computer services more benficial to students and to make the services more accessible for faculty instruction," said Tim Lesher '94, a Student Consultant for Computer Services. "Even though it seems right now that there are less computers available to students, there will actually be more computers available and accessible than last year."

The projects completed this summer are the first step in a two or three year program that will open a campus-wide network of accessibility. When fully installed, the network will provide all the resources available through the system to a student or faculty member who is located anywhere on campus.

According to Eschinger, the Committee of Academic Computing is currently reviewing the possibility of "going into" the student dormitories and installing total accessibility capabilities in each room.

AIDS crisis affects campus community

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In an effort to furthur educate the Bucknell community about the dangers of AIDS, free and confidential HIV testing was administered at Ziegler Health Center Wednesday, Sept. 23.

Representatives from the Pennsylvania Department of Health came to campus to administer the testing and provide counseling for the 36 students who were tested for the HIV infection.

According to Jan Baylor, staff nurse at the Health Center, "this is a good way to educate people" about the AIDS virus. Anyone who is tested receives counseling at the time of the test and when the results are released.

"Sex with condoms is not safe sex but it is less risky sex."
—Patty Stroup, infection control nurse

This is the fourth consecutive semester that HIV testing has been offered at the Health Center. Last semester, the testing was conducted over three days during AIDS Awareness Week and 71 students were tested.

This semester represented the lowest participation to date for this service. In 1991, 85 people were tested in the spring semester and 59 in the fall.

Baylor said the low turn-out may be because the testing was administered too early this semester.

Confidentiality is maintained, as the patient does not give his/her name, but instead uses an assigned number both at the time of the test and when the results are complete.

Baylor stated "We are concerned about getting the word out about AIDS prevention and safer sex practices."

Sept. 1990 statistics from the Centers for Disease Control indicate that 4% of the total cases of HIV in men and 6% of the total cases in women are people in the 20-24-year old age group.

Even though these numbers are fairly low, the HIV infection has a long latency period. This indicates that many 25-35 year olds with AIDS probably contracted the disease in their late teens or early twenties.

Despite the availability of information on AIDS and various education efforts targeted towards college students, surveys have shown that students' behaviors have not changed significantly due to this potential threat.

Approximately only half of the undergraduates surveyed in recent studies said that they had changed their sexual behaviors to avoid HIV infection.

The most common change was to reduce the number of sexual partners, and only 15% of the sexually active students reported that they always used condoms.

According to Patty Stroup, infection control nurse in employee health at Evangelical Hospital, "Sex with condoms is not safe sex but it is less risky sex."

Stroup said that it is important to look for latex condoms that list their expiration date and that contain nonoxynol-9.

In response to these statistics, Baylor said "All campuses are striving for education." Bucknell's AIDS Task Force encouraged the initiation of HIV testing on campus.

Baylor described the task force, which is now called the AIDS Awareness Committee, as "a liaison group between students, the health center, and the administration — an ideas group, a working group."

HIV testing on campus is performed once each semester, but free and confidential testing is also administered at the Lewisburg State Health Center by appointment each Tuesday.

Fund-raising for YMCA begins

ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

The West Branch YMCA (Young Men's Christian Association) is extending its program to Union County by establishing a facility at 100 N. Fifth St., Lewisburg.

Established in the 1800's, the YMCA has dedicated itself to the mission of helping people grow in mind, body, and spirit. They pledge to provide services regardless of ability to pay, remaining a charitable organization which sustains itself through contributions, membership programs and volunteerism.

Although the YMCA is traditionally associated with swimming and fitness, the Lewisburg site plans to offer a great deal more, with activities such as creative writing, drama, drawing, cinematography, and gymnastics.

West Branch Board member Dr. Steven Kramm said that "The Lewisburg community is in need... of youth-oriented programming."

"Enthusiasm for the YMCA just keeps on growing," said Shannon Sheaffer, new Program Director for the Lewisburg facility. She promises to provide the people of Union County with as many activities as the YMCA can support.

A project of this size can be very costly. Fortunately for the YMCA, Jacquie Stiefel has announced that the proceeds from the Fifth Annual Harold R. Stiefel Charity Show will be donated to the project and help them to achieve their target of a November 2 opening day.

Each year, Mrs. Stiefel organizes a charity event held at the Campus Theater, formerly owned and operated by her late husband. This year's program will be held on October 28.

Entertainment begins at 7:00 p.m. featuring Bucknell's own Bison Chips and Silhouettes; refreshments will be served by members of the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity. The feature presentation, a classic film whose title is yet to be announced, will begin at 8:00 p.m.

Tickets for the benefit show are $5.00 and will be available the first week of October from the Campus Theater, Lewisburg area merchants, the YMCA offices both in Milton and Sunbury, and various other regional businesses.

Members of the Bucknell community are strongly encouraged to attend.

Task force moves toward revised judicial system

BY DENISE MAUTONE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Two task forces have been working to revise the principles underlying judicial philosophy. The current judicial system has been in place for 25 years.

The first committee, known as the Ad Hoc Committee on Judicial Philosophy, was appointed by vice-president of Student Services, Barbara Shailor. The second committee, co-chaired by Jack Pyper, Dean of Arts and Sciences, and John Dunlop, Dean of Students, met as early as fall of last semester.

In order to gain insight, the Ad Hoc Committee reviewed roughly 25 student handbooks from various colleges and universities. According to Dean Pyper, "It isn't always easy to understand a school's philosophy regarding their disciplinary system based on their handbooks."

Once these 18 principles were articulated, they were put into written word by Dan Gilbert, Management faculty member. "Dan has a rather well-defined way of saying things. He was crucial to all of the committee's discussions," said Dunlop.

Now that the principles outlining judicial philosophy have been devised, they must encounter a second committee, or the Judicial System Implementing Task Force. Co-chaired by Dean Pyper, and also by student Sandra Green '92, the second committee will try to design a system that is inclusive and well representative of these proposed principles. An example of one of the 18 outlined principles would be the decentralization of the university's power in dealing with disciplinary problems.

In the meantime, Dunlop has proposed an Interim Disciplinary System (IDS) that could be approved within the next few weeks. Under this proposal, the accused are guaranteed "due process" and a fair hearing.

It is designed to insure decision making will be a "community" based implementation of sanctions, and not that of one individual. Further, the proposal would enhance the role of students in the disciplinary process. However, this entire process could take as long as 1-2 years.

In addition, there is no assurance that the proposal for a new judicial system will be approved. "I certainly have every hope that the proposal will be implemented, especially since there is so much research and work involved," said Dunlop.

News Briefs

On Campus

Flu shots available

Flu shots will be available at the Student Medical Health Center weekdays, for one month, beginning Tuesday, October 6.

Annual vaccination is strongly recommended by the U.S. Public Health Service for all individuals who are at an increased risk of adverse consequences from infections of the lower respiratory tract.

Side effects of the vaccination are few but may include pain and redness at the site of the injection for one or two days.

Attention Deficit Disorder is discussed

A lecture concerning Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD) will be presented on Tuesday, October 6 at 7 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

Dr. Craig Liden, founder and senior medical director of TRANSACT Health Systems, will be on campus to talk about the signs, symptoms and treatment of ADD.

The impetus for bringing Dr. Liden to campus came from a student who was recently diagnosed with ADD. The student recognizes that he is undoubtedly not the only student on campus who is affected by this disorder.

Pro-life versus pro-choice

Local advocates of the pro-life movement will participate in the National Life Chain rally in Allenwood along Route 15 on Sunday, October 4.

Between 500 and 700 advocates are expected to participate in the rally to demonstrate their unified support of the pro-life movement.

The Pro-Choice Action League will counter the event by sponsoring a Pledge-A-Link fundraiser. Advocates of the pro-choice movement can pledge an amount of money for each link in the Life Chain.

All money collected will be used for local pro-choice activities.

Homecoming float winners announced

The Homecoming Committee has announced the winners of their Homecoming Parade float competition.

Floats were judged in three categories. The winners are: Kappa Kappa Gamma and Phi Kappa Psi for Best Overall Appearance; Lambda Chi Alpha and Kappa Alpha Theta for Best Incorporation of Theme; and Chi Phi and Phi Mu, who tied for the Most Spirited award.

R.O.T.C. eliminated from budget

The Air Force R.O.T.C. (Reserve Officer Training Corps) at Lehigh University will be discontinued as of this summer due to budget cuts.

Lehigh President Peter Likins said that the government is making cut-backs in almost all military departments because of the sweeping changes in the world in the past two years.

There are approximately 147 Air Force R.O.T.C. detachments at schools across the United States with approximately 2500 students enrolled in their programs. The government wants this number reduced to 1500 in orderto save money.

The New Gettysburg Address

Gettysburg College of Pennsylvania is sponsoring a new public-issues lecture series called "The New Gettysburg Address."

The series is designed to provide a national forum for speakers to discuss contemporary issues and concerns. George A. Haaland, President of the College, hopes that the speakers will challenge their audience just as Abraham Lincoln challenged the nation to live out the ideals of its founders in the initial Gettysburg Address.

Former White House chief of staff John H. Sununu is scheduled as the first guest speaker of the series. Sununu's talk, titled "Moving Into the New Millenium," will be presented on Tuesday, October 6 at the College.

Largest donation ever

Glassboro State College in New Jersey has received a $100 million donation from philanthropist Henry M. Rowan.

The donation is believed to be the largest individual gift to any college or university in history. In appreciation, the college's trustees have voted to rename the school "Rowan College of New Jersey."

Rowan intended the money be used to build an engineering school, improve endowments, and provide free tuition to children of employees of his manufacturing company.

MIT, Ivys found guilty

A federal district judge ruled earlier this month that 23 prestigious northeastern colleges and universities, including the Massachusettes Institute of Technology and the Ivy League Schools, many have violated federal antitrust laws for more than 20 years.

The schools in violation were charged with comparing the financial aid packages they planned to offer to admitted students. The presiding judge said that the group's activities denied students and their families the right to select colleges based at least in part on their cost.

Greek love rituals—have they changed?

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Candlelights, like many other aspects of Greek life, are steeped in tradition. They embody all of the mysterious and ritualistic practices which today form the foundation for fraternity and sorority life.

At Bucknell, candlelights usually exist in order to recognize the sorority woman who has been "pinned" by a fraternity brother. Pinning means that a couple is publicly announcing the seriousness and commitment of their relationship. In our parents' generation pinning was considered to be extremely serious; receiving your boyfriend's fraternity pin was almost on par with an engagement ring. Today some of the emphasis has dissipated.

Rashes of candlelights tend to occur in the spring, when a group of seniors is getting ready to scatter in many different directions. Often, couples wish to solidify their relationship in this pending confusion, and to have something with which to connect themselves to college. Others wait this long to be sure of the strength of their relationship.

A candlelight is arranged through the ritual chairperson. The pinnee alerts the chairperson that a candlelight needs to be scheduled but does not reveal her identity. This gives the gathering an element of excitement and suspense. Sorority sisters stand in a circle passing around a special candle from hand to hand, once for friendship and the second time for pinning. When the candle reaches the woman having the candlelight she will blow it out. The candle can also go around the circle a third time for marriage and a fourth for pregnancy.

Women tend to view pinning and candlelights as exciting and sentimental. Liz Shaw '94 commented, "I look forward to candlelights. They are a unifiying experience for those who really want to show their support for those who are happy."

Men have mixed emotions about pinning. Tom Mapletoft '93 said, "Pinning a girl really depends on the individual. Some guys think that it's a big deal, and some guys just do it because their girlfriends want to be pinned."

Some men are very protective of their pins, for which so much of their sweat and blood was given. They find it difficult to give it to someone who has not earned it. They are hesitant to allow themselves to appear "frivolous" by brothers whose attitutes towards "throwing away" such a sacred part of their bond may not be favorable. Shaw says, "I've heard some horror stories about fraternity reactions to one of their brothers pinning a girl and I think that really diminishes the value of the fraternity. If they're really his brothers they'll be happy for him."

In addition to pinning, there is also lavaliering. This occurs when the man gives his girlfriend his fraternity lavalier, which is a pendant made up of his fraternity letters. Lavaliering is generally not considered as serious as pinning, although the relationship is not to be taken lightly. The couple is expressing that they are a definite pair, but they are not considering marriage as a possibility in the near future.

Jen Smith '95, who has been lavaliered, testifies that it serves as a symbolic way to stabilize and add security to the relationship. She also enjoys her new status among her boyfriend's brothers. "I think it's kind of fun because people are always interested when they see me wearing the lavalier. I feel as if I'm really respected by the brothers."

Because lavaliering and pinning are Greek-only events, they tend to exude an air of mystery to those who are not Greek. "I think that the whole idea of lavaliering and pinning is just a nice ceremonial event, but I don't think that independents should feel threatened by the idea that one needs a candlelight to prove that the relationship is worthwhile," says Shaw. "Sometimes people try to stay within the Greek system when dating. I think that you should just date who you want. Just because that person may not be Greek does not mean that it isn't a valuable relationship."

BY ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Fall Break is rapidly approaching, and while many students are opting for the tried-and-true traditions of returning home for a few nights of uninterrupted sleep, hot meals, free laundry service, and showers with a consistent water temperature, there are countless other options for students with a sense of adventure.

Whatever the activity, at home or on campus, try to stay outdoors! The winter funk blues sneak up quickly, so stay active and take advantage of the last few bearable days until the weather takes it's toll. A few outdoor activities to keep in mind are mountain biking or hiking. Take the time to explore something off campus, in nature, for a change. Check out Penn's Cave or Woodward's Cavern. Central Pennsylvania is packed with caves, mountains and nature trails waiting to be discovered. The more daring individual might even try backpacking or camping in the Bald Eagle National Park.

Unique things to do over Fall Break

Embrace mother nature—go camping, hiking, or back-packing.

Find the kid in you again—try roller skating or bowling.

Be a tourist—visit the historical sites of Lewisburg.

Vegetate—read a good book or see an old favorite movie.

Share your time—volunteer at a local church or nursing home.

The random road trip is always an adventuresome idea for those with a car and the parent's gas card. Hop in the car, start, and go with no particular place in mind. Don't forget the road atlas, though.

For the less daring, but equally bored individuals, try visiting local places of interest, like Williamsport, the home of the Little League World Series, or Clyde Peeling's Reptileland in Allenwood.

If transportation is a problem, walk around Lewisburg (yes, walk!). Believe it or not, Lewisburg is the site for enough antique shops, specialty stores and museums to last all of Fall Break, and then some. Lewis Keister Antiques, on Market Street, Lewisburg Antique Center on St. Mary Street, and The Victorian Lady on Route 45 West are only a few of the collectible shops in the area. The Slifer House and Packwood Museum provide a day's worth of Lewisburg and Central Pennsylvania history. To satisfy the sweet tooth, stop by Purity Candy Company on North Eighth for some homemade confections.

For the young at heart, grab a few unbashful buddies and go roller skating at the Sunset Rink on Route 15. Or, strap on a pair of hideous rentable shoes and go bowling at any of the area bowling allies. If you haven't tried rollerblading, rent a pair at W.L Donehower's and see the sites of Lewisburg by wheel. If you haven't ever rollerbladed, Fall Break is the prime time to learn. No one is on campus to watch you fall on your face.

Find a place to volunteer for a few days. Hospitals and day care centers are usually eager to accept willing volunteers with an excess of free time.

Write letters to those long lost relatives and neglected friends that have forgotten your name. Letters usually get responses, which means something other than campus mail in your box.

If cold weather is not a part of your vocabulary and you have a TV and VCR, pop some corn, grab a blanket and watch sequel movies. Rocky I-?, Back To The Future, Star Wars and Friday the 13th Part (fill in the blank) are a few worthwhile, not-to-be-missed Saturday sequel events.

Another way to spend quality time inside is reading. Read a book that is not a requirement for a class. It is much more entertaining when you do not have a deadline to meet. Stephen King's new book Gerald's Game is a sure to please new release.

If nothing else, do something different. Try something new. Most importantly, take advantage of the available opportunities. Thanksgiving Break is a long ways away.

We've come a long way, Bucknell

50 years ago at Bucknell

—In these days of accelerated college programs, we feel that there is one phase of college life in which Bucknell University lags far behind the great majority of other American universities. This concerns the matter of requiring freshmen to pledge a fraternity for an entire school year, from October to May, before the University will consider them eligible for initiation. In the best interests of all concerned, the University, the fraternities, the actives of the fraternities, and the pledgees, we feel that a revision of the administration's rules should be made, whereby freshmen may become eligible for initiation into fraternities at the close of the first semester, in the early part of February. (Bucknellian Editorial—October 30, 1942)

—Bucknell this year is functioning on a wartime budget. All student organizations on the campus have voluntarily accepted large cuts in expenditures and as a result the whole of Bucknell's budget is reduced $1342 from that of 1941–1942. At present the budget stands as follows: Bucknellian, $820; the Christian Association, $1,254; Debating, $250; Orchestra, $325; and Women's Athletic Association, $375.

—In a recent survey made by the Bucknell Christian Association, it was found that the number of Bucknell men serving in Uncle Sam's armed forces is close to 500. There are 207 Bucknellians in the Army. Sixty-four of the Army men are learning to patrol, or are already patroling the skies. The rest of the soldiers comprise Infantry, Artillery, Headquarter Division, Medial Military Police, and Signal Corps.

—It is interesting to note that one professor here recently implied that those with long hair are disloyal to the country. Some students seem awfully concerned about the proper length of mens' hair. Some professors apparently are also. But should this be a concern to those few people interested in anything deeper than surface appearances?

—The Interfraternity Council last month defeated a proposal to split up the fraternities and sororities into heterogeneous groups to spend an evening together at cocktails, dinners, and dessert during a proposed fall Greek Weekend.

—The Board of Trustees last weekend approved changes in University regulations. The new rule states that "the use of alcoholic beverages by students is forbidden in all non-residential University buildings, out-of-doors on the campus, and in the main public rooms of residence halls.

Pasta dinner pizza satisfies any appetite

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Located across the river in Montandon, Bertoni's is the pizza palace of distinction. Their creations, such as the Pasta Dinner pizza sets them apart.

BY SCOTT DONALDSON AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Tired of the same old pizza? Well, so were we until we discovered the Pasta Dinner pizza ($13.50—large, $12—medium, $10.50—small) at Bertoni's.

Typically, a large pizza won't satisfy our combined appetites. But Bertoni's monstrosity, loaded with spaghetti noodles, meatballs, mozzarella and Parmesan cheeses, and marinara sauce, is enough to fill both of us and still have plenty left over to feed our pizza mooching roommates. All agree that however weird looking, this pizza/spaghetti combination, piled onto homemade pizza bread, is worth the experimentation.

The pizza, while messy, and on some occasions, downright greasy, is delicious. It's as though you've gone to visit your favorite Italian grandmama for dinner, taken her fabulous homemade bread and barbarically enough, stuffed it with her best spaghetti.

Mark Bertoni, who runs the pizzeria along side his mother and father, says of his creation, "I tested it between my family and friends. They said it was a complete meal." And it is.

Bertoni's also features a fine plain pizza. While better than average, it does not compare in taste or size to the Pasta Dinner pizza, though. Sub sandwiches from the shop look decent in size and are layered onto the same delicious bread from which the Pasta Dinner pizza is created.

Mark, Frank, and Dont Bertoni have run the pizza/sub shop out of Montandon for a year. High rent forced them off of Market Street in Lewisburg after five years of operation at that location.

The one and a half mile drive to the little town across the bridge is worth the time and gas. So is the couple extra bucks for the Pasta Dinner pizza which can feed and satisfy a whole household.

Bertoni's is located on Main Street, Montandon, across the river from campus and just over the railroad tracks. For free delivery, from 11:30 a.m.–11 p.m., call 524–5888.

Why bother to register and vote?

We've all heard it on MTV. The 18–24 year old group can "rock the vote." If all college-aged citizens registered and cast a ballot, all elections, local and national, could turn out decidedly different.

It takes 15 minutes at most to register to vote, yet many of us at Bucknell pass on this American right. Why? We are, after all, at the greatest stage of learning in our lives. If our professors and the daily newspapers that we are assigned to read haven't pounded this responsibility into our heads by now, when will we learn it?

Perhaps we are learning too much. College courses open our eyes in ways that high school civics classes never could have. At Bucknell we've learned that the Declaration of Independence was written by all upper middle class monied white men. Many of us have also discovered that today's government is even more corrupt than ever.

As we've entered the University and begun to explore issues on our own, most of us have also found that our beliefs, and thus our party affiliation, is no longer the same as that of our parents. This is both confusing and frustrating.

Our generation of students wants different things for our lives. We want change. Heading our list is a new environment and a new social our list is a new environment and a new social climate. Following not too far behind are the specific issues of race and gender equality and a quality education for both the rich and the poor, as well as the middle class. We want the United States to be strong enough to employ us all, but not exploitative enough to stifle developing countries in the process.

Knowing what we want and knowing how to get it are two different things, however. In these days of continued mudslinging, soundbites, and disunited party platforms how can we truly decipher which candidates stand for what? The media is supposed to provide reliable information, but how can they when often the candidates won't even tell the reporters the truth?

Political science professors hold lectures and debates to attempt to explain America's greatest game, but even these academics profess to holding biases. Personal experiences influence them as well as the media on their election coverage.

Our personal lifestyles here at Bucknell influence us as well. It is not without reason that the campus has been labeled the Bucknell Bubble. While we have been learning about and examining the world, many of us have also realized that we are habituating a rather idyllic place. Lewisburg is not the slums of Philadelphia or Boston. burg is not the slums of Philadelphia or Boston. Crime does not run rampant and, even if we personally commit a crime on campus, our names will not be released. We are sheltered.

Will the choices that we make as college students in this election be satisfactory to us once we enter the "real world"? Or will our views change once again, perhaps realign with our parents once jobs and monthly payments preoccupy our minds?

It takes a lot of thought to vote intelligently for no one really knows if an outsider like Lynn Yeakel can accomplish more in the Senate than incumbent Arlen Specter. No one can accurately predict if Clinton can make changes that Bush cannot.

Some may ask, "Why bother?" The simple fact is, if enough people aged 18-24 vote, we can make a difference. We can move one step closer to getting what we want. Registering and voting take hardly any time and costs no money. In fact, the whole process is clearly within a college student's realm of experience. To vote intelligently means to question authority. Everyone has until tomorrow to register. Find an application and get it in the mail.

TO THE EDITOR:

My purpose in writing is to obtain public support for holding the Congress and Administration responsible for failing to enforce Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 concerning women's participation in intercollegiate athletics.

On April 9, 1992, Chairwoman Cardiss Collins of the House Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer Protection and Competitiveness opened hearings on: Title IX: The effects on Women's Sports and Gender Equity. Copies of the witness list for this hearing and all documents cited herein are available at your newspaper office for public review or copying. In this hearing, Mr. Schultz, executive director, National Collegiate Athletic Associate(NCAA) discussed the efforts of the NCAA to assist its membership in achieving gender equity in intercollegiate athletics.

In my opinion, because the NCAA sponsors twice as many male teams in its basketball and lacrosse Division I championship tournaments as female teams and no comparable female team to the large male football teams in these championship tournaments, it is extremely unlikely that the NCAA will be considered a serious factor in the promotion of gender equity among its membership.

In testimony at these hearings, Ms. Vargyas, Senior Counsel for Education and Employment, National Women's Law Center, states that the underlying cause for inequities in the treatment of women in competitive athletics is "a failure of leadership in both the university community and government enforcement agencies to address the problem (see page 2). She reviewed the Brooklyn College case which was resolved by the Office For Civil Rights (OCR), U. S. Department of Education, as an example of this failed government enforcement. In that case, several dates by which time the College had committed to take certain actions had elapsed without such action having been taken. However, OCR closed this case finding no violation based on assurances given by this institution under investigation. There was no enforcement of those violated assurances. To reinforce this assertion by Ms. Vargyas, I am enclosing the assurances made by Towson State University (TSU) and the first evaluation by OCR under these assurances of April 9, 1992. This evaluation shows that in at least 2 of 5 areas, TSU failed to meet its assurances in recruitment and support services (see items #3 and #4). Moreover, OCR found that a new area, athletic financial aid, which was adequate in its 1989-90 academic year review had deteriorated dramatically in the 1990-91 academic year. No OCR enforcement action is discussed or threatened in this evaluation for TSU's failure to comply completely with its assurances to the OCR.

Although Ms. Vargyas suggested to this Subcommittee that the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights, The Honorable Michael L. Williams, be supined to appear before this Subcommittee hearing; she was informed that he would appear at another meeting of this Subcommittee. However, I was informed in September, 1992, by a subcommittee staff member that due to insufficient time no more hearings on this matter will be held by this Subcommittee in the one hundred and second Congress.

If sufficient time is unavailable for enforcement of Title IX by either the Administration or the 102nd Congress; then, the public must demand an explanation from their Senators and Representatives to justify such an extreme delay in view of the enactment of Title IX twenty years ago. In order to assist the public in this.'effort, I am enclosing the Washington, D. C. addresses and the district telephone numbers of all these House Subcommittee on Commerce, Consumer Protection, and Competitiveness members. In addition to obtaining the positions of candidates for national office, the public is strongly urged to make it clear that any incumbents who thought that after 20 years Title IX should wait more before it is seriously enforced in competitive athletics, will wait more than 20 years to obtain their vote at elections.

If someone desires to discuss these matters further or to obtain additional information, they may contact me at telephone (410) 455-9687.

Panhel promotes the rules of rush

TO THE EDITOR:

From the number of letters, signed and unsigned, that we have received since Rush as well as the letter in last week's issue from Barrett Wood and many comments we've heard, it is clear that there are a number of misconceptions in people's minds about the sorority rush process in general, and sophomore rush in particular. Some of people's information and perceptions are just incorrect, some is wishful thinking, and some is constructive and helpful. Through this letter we hope to assist people to a more thorough understanding of the rush process at Bucknell and to acknowledge the areas of concern and to make a commitment to address concerns to the greatest extent possible.

1. Seven of Bucknell's eight sororities are national (as distinguished from local) organizations and are members of the National Panhellenic Conference (NPC), a body "established to foster interfraternity relationships, to assist collegiate chapters of the NPC member groups, and to cooperate with colleges and universities in maintaining the highest scholastic and social standards." All members of the NPC have ratified a document called the "UNANIMOUS AGREEMENTS", whose provisions are binding on College Panhellenic Councils and their member fraternities (sororities) as well as national and alumnae groups. Bucknell's local sorority, Beta Gamma, has agreed to cooperate with Bucknell's Panhellenic Council rules as much as possible.

2. The Preferential Bidding System and Continuous Open Bidding are required of all NPC College Panhelienics. Other requirements include a prohibition on the use of alcoholic beverages in rush and prohibition on the participation of men in rush functions. The individual College Panhellenic Council establishes all other rules governing rush activities, guided by a number of NPC "Policies and Recommendations Pertaining to College Panhellenics". These may deal with allowable chapter expenses for Rush, party schedules, silence period, penalties, etc.

3. All members of Bucknell's Panhelienic Council, which means every sorority, have participated in the formation of and voted acceptance of the Rush Rules and Regulations as well as the Rush Schedule. This includes the setting of quota, chapter total, the role of Rush Counselors, etc. Panhellenic's use of a Chapter Total (1 15 members) is intended to "even out the membership between the different sororities on campus." (1 992 Rush Rules and Regulations) Quota (36 this year) was set using a method accepted by all chapters based on the number of women still involved in Rush during the third round of parties.

4. Bucknell University is involved in rush only to the extent of having mandated that Fraternity and Sorority Formal Rush shall take place during the first semester of students' sophomore year and be limited to no more than 10 class days; and that procedures be adopted to assure that "adequate spaces within the Greek system [exist] for those who wish to affiliate while maintaining selectivity by chapters." ("TIP Task Team 1: Greek Changes", report to President Sojka, May 2, 1991) The last full Spring Rush (for second-semester freshmen) occurred in the spring of 1991. The following semester, Fall of '91, the first Fall Rush took place where sophomores and transfer students were given the opportunity to rush. This rush was informal because of the small numbers registering (most of those interested in going Greek had rushed the previous spring). With the institution of Fall sophomore Rush in 1991, there is no longer to be a spring rush.

5. The use of a computer during rush was a joint decision by the Interfraternity Council and the Panhellenic Council. Panhellenic has used a computer in this way for many years; this was a first for IFC. Specialized programs exist to assist Panhel and IFC in scheduling and bid-matching, tedious and laborious

"A semester abroad...could be your best semester!"

BY STEVE REGISTER

A fulfilling semester may constitute Dean's List for the scholarly, playoffs for the athlete, many new friends for the sociable, and of course, numerous drinking escapades for the "partiers." But isn't there more? The answer is a resounding "YES!," and for most of you seniors, it disturbs me to inform you that you have missed your chance (at least during your time at BU). Juniors, you can scramble and still take advantage of the remarkable experience during the second semester. As for all you sophomores and freshmen (who I'm sure are eagerly reading this to stay abreast of the news at your new school) start planning right now for the semester of your life. By now, some of the BU veterans have already guessed what I am talking about, but for the less enlightened students I will state it plain and simple—a semester abroad! A semester abroad was mine and could be your most exciting semester in your four years at BU. Like all good opportunities, however, it is only as rewarding as the amount of effort and energy you commit; therefore, choose a program that will be of interest to you. Don't let your parents influence you against you own will (even though they are most likely footing the bill) and certainly don't select a program for the sole reason that friends are going (you will see them in six months and remember there will be a very competent postal and telecommunications service wherever you go).

The point is that when studying abroad you are given the chance to immerse yourself into your host country's culture with little academic pressure. This learning will complement your education at BU and provide cultural and social opportunities that no university in the US is capable of offering at home.

This semester is for YOUR enlightenment, development, entertainment. relaxation, or whatever you prefer so be selfish and make the decision for yourself.

Now for you disbelievers or those of indifference, do yourself a favor and at least stop by the Office of International Studies (Taylor House) and inquire about the study abroad program. It can't hurt and who knows, a semester or year from now you might decide you would like to partake in this adventure and then you will be ready because of your preliminary preparation. Instead of boring you with the details of selecting an appropriate program for yourself, which a number of other people can do, I will offer you information and insight into studying abroad which only a select few can do and each in a unique, personal fashion.

To those readers not cognizant of the academic curriculum abroad, the most widely held "secret" is that the work is not demanding. This is a desirable and necessary characteristic in the programs because the student is able to dabble into fields of study that would be unthinkable or even impossible at Bucknell. Also, it allows for much of the learning to take place outside the classroom as it should in such an environment of opportunity. In Vienna, the cultural center of Europe, I enrolled in a music class for the obvious reason of what a better place than Vienna to study music. This was a chance for me to forget my Management major and start afresh in a new field of study, a student's dream from time to time, even if it is only for one semester. I vividly remember what happened when I strayed from my course of study at BU and took Art History with virtually no artistic knowledge and my GPA won't allow me to forget it either. The point is that when studying abroad you are given the chance to immerse yourself into your host country's culture with little academic pressure. This learning will complement your education at BU and provide cultural and social opportunities that no university in the US is capable of offering at home. In addition, I learned more about European political history, theories, movements, and current developments than any single class is capable of teaching me at BU. In no way do I intend to belittle the Political Science Department, but instead my intentions are to show the benefits of being surrounded and being a part of your subject of study.

Another benefit of the light workload and being abroad is the opportunity to travel on weekends, breaks, and either before or after the program begins or ends. Traveling with the purpose of seeing different parts of Europe, meeting people of all cultures and teaming about their culture, and discovering what other nationalities think about America, thus giving a different perspective on the States, is and integral part of the overseas experience and was my top priority. From historically rich France, across the breathtaking Alps, into the world renowned beer halls of Munich, to the chaos of Italy, and finishing with the belly-dancers in Istanbul and the bizarre terrain of Central Turkey, I visually appreciated the vast differences from west to east. Furthermore, I witnessed the result of forty-five years of Soviet neglect economically, environmentally, culturally, and socially in the Eastern European countries where now only a hint of their former beauty remains and unfortunately a latent, uncontrollable supernationalism is rising. While standing in Wenscelas Square, I imagined the Soviet tanks rolling down the boulevard to suppress Dubcek's policy of giving communism a human face, and involuntarily, I felt a knot in my stomach because now history felt real and alive. Only now could I finally relate to how this inhumanity causes anger, hatred, fear and hopelessness among the suppressed. This feeling of occupation and defenselessness is foreign to Americans today who have never been occupied by a foreign power and have never seen fighting on their own soil. Moreover, I observed an unashamed, unrestrained display of xenophobic feelings in Western Europe and visited the concentration/death camps, Dachau and Auschwitz-Birkenau. I was appalled to discover some of these beliefs and feelings that gave Nazi Germany such strength and power. I felt sick to my stomach as I envisioned the SS troops duckwalking through the streets with all their propaganda, and as I saw, in museums, portrayals of their brutality and disrespect for human life. The ugliness of history, the confusion and lack of direction of the present, and the uncertainties and fears of the future that face Europe concern me. However, on a more promising note, I met people who desire and support change and were willing to work for that dream. Most memorable were students of the University of Transylvania embarrassed by and ashamed of the Romanian government yet were open in expressing their views, and the prodemocratic Bulgarian Congressman who talked of the future and change with the spirit of a young, newly elected US Congressman. Equally unforgettable were the Czechs and Hungarians who were so enthusiastic about life and freedom and hungry for capitalism and why not? — They are the most developed and prosperous of the old Eastern Bloc People. Experiences like these force students abroad to reassess if not redefine their values and beliefs.

Two months after returning from Vienna, I feel that I have a better grasp of people and events that shape the world, an understanding attainable only from living in a foreign country. Although at first leery of the idea of studying abroad for a semester in a country and surrounded by a language completely foreign to me, I decided the advantages far outweighed the disadvantages, and by the end of my first few days in Vienna, I knew I had made the right decision.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Should the pigeons be saved? The debate continues

TO THE EDITOR:

This letter is in response to Charles B. Grant who defended the Hegins Labor Day Pigeon shoot in last week's Bucknellian. Charles, your argument was weak, selfish, thoughtless and elitist.

What gives you the right to place yourself and all other humans, who wish to needlesly destroy animal life, above those that you kill? I'd say you were a racist of sorts, Charles. I think the word used is "specist." You need to realize that we share this planet with many other living things.

First of all, the fact that the pigeon shoots are an American tradition does not make them acceptable. Have you ever read "The Lottery?" Obviously not. Don't use tradition as an excuse for such a pathetic event. I suppose women shouldn't have the right to vote or say "no" since they didn't have those rights traditionally.

Although they can't defend themselves, animals DO have rights, and people like us will continue to fight for them.

Secondly, you use the time-worn and misleading "overpopulation" excuse. What do you know about managing the natural populations in our delicate ecosystem? Do we gather up homeless people and shoot them because they represent an overpopulation, which in turn poses a threat to our cities' health? No. Instead we think of more intelligent and ethical options. If humans had not disrupted the natural food chain in our environment to begin with, natural predators would control the pigeon population. Having pigeon shoots is a selfish way to keep the population down. Find a better way - and try not benefitting only yourself in the process.

As for your attack on Ms. Yanne, she not only had the courage for trying to save the wounded pigeon she found, she showed kindness, concern and love. Yet you label her an "enemy of our nation and our way of life." You, my friend, are the one who displays a lack of courage, and you disguise this in your sick need to kill animals in order to feel like a man.

Although they can't defend themselves, animals DO have rights, and people like us will continue to fight for them. Those of you who take advantage of helpless animals for your own pleasure make us sick. We're not radicals, either. We are simply people who respect the rights of the living things with whom we share our world. Our planet is a fragile environment in which we must strive to uphold the balances between the oceans, the forests, the mountains, and of course, man. A pigeon shoot certainly isn't a step in the right direction. Perhaps you could use your excess energy to recycle something, Charles. The world needs it.

processes when done manually. Both of these groups received special training and used the computer to facilitate their rush activities. While errors are not unknown in the computer system, they are far less likely to occur there than with "humans", assuming that accurate information is put into the system.

6. It is important to note here that membership in Greek organizations involves a process of mutual selection. That is, both rushees and chapters make decisions about membership. Chapters vote on who should be invited back to parties and to whom bids should be extended and rushees choose which invitations to accept and which to turn down. It is inevitable that, in the short time available in parties to meet each other, both sororities and rushees will miss getting to know each other well enough to make a sound judgment in every case. It is also inevitable that with mutual selection there will be mutual disappointment. Just as rushees can be hurt by being released by a group they were interested in, a sorority will be disappointed or hurt by someone they were anxious to have as a member not accepting their invitation.

7. Statistics provided here are to give an idea of the results of this year's Rush together with a comparison with the last several full formal Rushes:

Dropped by all chapters or not bid-matched

13%	8%	3%	4%

This year every Rushee who did not withdraw on her own accord was invited to at least one preferential party. A few did not accept invitations and withdrew at this point. After bid-matching, 16 Rushees did not receive bids. Four of these women did not match because they only listed one sorority on their preference card, thereby decreasing their chance for a bid. Eleven of the 16 have been offered bids since the end of Rush.

Withdrew throughout Rush

This year women withdrew for a variety of reasons, but it is important to note that they all had invitations at the point they withdrew; that is, sororities were interested in them.

8. While there may have been hurt feelings, almost all Rushees were given an opportunity to go Greek. Only five remain unmatched. This leads to the conclusion that the hurt feelings were not due to the lack of an opportunity to go Greek, because that opportunity was there. Rather, some Rushees appear to have made decisions which limited their options. Throughout the system there is still space for more than fifty women. The practice of Continuous Open Bidding allows sororities to extend bids if they choose throughout the remainder of the school year. Because of this and the reasons cited above, we reiterate that there will be no spring Rush.

We hope this letter has addressed most of the concerns expressed by members of the Bucknell community as well as dealing with the rumors and misconceptions that seem to have been present on campus in recent days.

Lisanske brings together art and life

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

Top row: various works of William Lisanske, professor of art. An award-winning sculptor, his talent is obvious. Bottom row: Lisanske stands in front of the music and arts building where he teaches courses in clay.

In class, William Lisanske, professor of art, could praise good work with comparisons to the craftsmanship of Indians in far away jungles, or halt a particular work with references to a mamoth elephant tooth he discovered as a child. But both encouragement and discouragement come in the form a story in Lisanke's unique way of teaching. An award-winning sculpturer, Lisanske has been sharing his talents and insights with students of all disciplines for over twenty years.

"Teaching becomes the dogmatic if you don't encourage and nurture students' work. The process is teachable, but the motivation must come from within one's self," said Lisanske.

One of the most rewarding teaching experiences, according to him, is, "knowing there are students out there that still have the motivation to be creative and consider it to be an important part of their lives." Involvement at some level in art, whether an engineer or English major, opens up numerous options for a more interesting life.

At the age of 14, Lisanske discovered clay, and from there his future was sealed. By high school, Lisanske was already creating his own work without the help of school courses. Lisanske went on to receive an MFA from the artistically renowned University of Iowa.

Since then, his work has received numerous national awards. In addition to having many of his pieces captured in public and private collections nationwide, two of Lisanske's pieces grace the Bucknell campus. One piece, a stone carving, is located in the Weis Center for Performing Arts.

A second sculpture titled "Stela," the Spanish word for free standing relief carving, stands near the faculty room and student center in the Langone Center. The inspiration for "Stela," a forged steel sculpture, was rooted in the jungles of the Yukatan Peninsula in the form and surface varieties of the Myan Indians.

Fame is not unique for the Lisanske name. Both of Lisanske's brothers are artists, and he has two sisters, one of whom is a writer, and the other a dancer. Bucknell Hall houses the work "Leonardo Lisanske," by Lisanke's older brother, in its lower hallway. His mother used to paint and her brothers were well-known painters in Argentina.

Lisanske's father, a professor at the University of Iowa, is, like his son, an award-winning artist and print maker. During high school, Lisanske used to assist his father in the more technical artistry of graphics art.

Like most artists, Lisanske has a purpose to his work. To him, art is a messenger for the artist's inner self. It stimulates the mind to think in different ways, ways that can be applied to all areas of life.

"Creativity in the arts is not an isolated talent," said Lisanske. "It opens up new ways of thinking about self and decision making situations."

More than anything, this is what Lisanske tries to teach his students. Forms and techniques can be done mechanically, but applying art to experiences is what makes a person an artist.

"The sense of self sufficiency and excitement that art provides often rubs off academically... Thinking differently can be a good experience for students. It opens up new pathways in the mind."

Duo to perform Gann's work at Weis Center

By Katie DeBonneville
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The piano duo Double Edge will be performing tonight at the Weis Center for Performing Arts. Double Edge consists of pianists Edmund Niemann and Nurit Tilles, "a very important New York duo," according to Kyle Gann, professor of music and new music critic for New York's Village Voice.

Double Edge's concentration in the area of progressive music is evident in tonight's program. All but one piece slated for their performance were written by twentieth century composers, including a piece by Gann.

Gann's piece, "I' Itoi Variations," was composed in 1985 after the birth of his son. Based on the Papago Indian song "Song of the Black Mountain," the piece has been performed once before by Double Edge.

"I' Itoi is the main figure in Papago mythology and is also known as 'Elder Brother,'" Gann explained. I' Itoi is thought to have led the Papago Indians to southern Arizona where they live today. It is believed that I' Itoi was based on the Aztec ruler Montezuma.

"The piece is a theme with eleven variations," said Gann. "The point of the piece is that the variations get further and further from the theme until variation six. At variation seven it returns to the starting point. Variation eleven goes backward to all of the others, kind of like a fast rewind."

Southwestern Indian music has great variations in rhythm because the rhythms are based on dance movements that take different amounts of time to execute. The Papago may well be the only tribe that is polyphonc, meaning that instead of singing in octaves, the women sing in different pitches than the men.

Tonight's concert also includes the official inauguration of a second Steinway grand piano, donated to the Weis Center through the combined efforts of Janet Weis and the Bucknell Association for the Arts.

In addition to performing tonight, Double Edge conducted a master piano class this afternoon in the Weis Center rehearsal room. Several Bucknell piano students performed as part of this workshop.

Tickets for tonights performance are available at the Weis Center box office for $15 ($5 with a BU ID). The concert will start promptly at 8:30 p.m.

J.P. Morgan Recruits on Campus this Fall . . .

J.P. Morgan seeks undergraduates with potential to become part of the Morgan team that provides sophisticated financial services to to corporations, governments, and wealthy individuals throughout the world.

If you're interested, watch for recruiters from J.P. Morgan who will soon conduct information sessions on campus. Meanwhile, read on.

Career tracks at J.P. Morgan

Graduates start their career at J.P. Morgan in one of our rigorous career development programs, depending on their interests, skills and background. The programs are Corporate Finance, Global Markets, Global Technology and Operations, Management Services, Audit-Plus, and Masters in Accounting. Each program begins with intensive training programs before entering an initial career track.

- In Corporate Finance, you provide research, marketing, and analytical support to client and product teams. You work on a variety of projects that range from identifying a client's optimal capital structuring to structuring a stock or bond underwriting.
- In Global Markets, recruits enter one of three areas: 1) sales, where you use a thorough understanding of Morgan's investment and risk management products to solve client problems, 2) trading, where you manage risk positions and make markets in financial securities and instruments, and 3) research, where you develop essential analytical tools.
- In Global Technology and Operations, there are four career tracks including problem-solving in operations, design of applied technology, evaluation of leading edge computer and communications technologies, and product development with related sales and marketing responsibilities in our Securities, Trust, and Information Services group.
- In Management Services, the firm's internal consulting group, you address strategic management issues of the firm. Following training, Management Services analysts take assignments in project management, product development, account administration, marketing, human resources, financial planning market research, and other key support functions.
- In the Audit-Plus program following training, you may pursue an auditing career analyzing the multifaceted risks inherent in our business, or pursue a career as a financial professional, performing the accounting, analysis, and financial reporting of Morgan's results for senior management, regulators, and stockholders.

To be continued at an upcoming information session.

Do career opportunities still exist on Wall Street?

They do at J.P. Morgan, a world leader in global finance.

We offer exceptional career opportunities for the highly motivated graduate in corporate finance, sales, trading and research, global technology and operations, internal consulting, auditing and financial management.

You don't need an educational background in finance to succeed at J.P. Morgan. Successful candidates will receive extensive on-the-job training. This training includes specialized programs that help develop requisite business knowledge and technical skills, and introduce the ethics, culture and team orientation that distinguish our firm.

Bucknell alumnus and choreographer returns as an artist-in-residence this semester

Choreographer Todd Rosenlieb '89, artist-in-residence in the department of theatre and dance, performs with Kelly Dekin in Ralph Lemon's "Folk Dance."

By Nicole Cobban
Bucknellian Staff Writer

How would you describe choreographer Todd Rosenlieb '89, artist in residence in the department of theatre and dance this semester?

"Daring, both personally and professionally," said Kristen Feeney '92. As company stage manager for the Bucknell Dance Company for four years, Feeney worked closely with Rosenlieb during his undergraduate career at Bucknell.

With a mischevous, school-boy grin and intelligent flashing eyes, Feeney's description is accurate. Rosenlieb's abundance of energy, enthusiasm, and daringness often tranfers itself into his choreography.

Rosenlieb conducted a movement workshop with the Bucknell Opera Company and chorale, focusing on methods of creating unique and expressive stage movements. One of the exercises included grouping members of the opera company into tableauxs, which are still poses that resemble photographs. The result was a series of poses in which a person's body, instead of their words, had to say everything about them.

"I wanted to show that you can engage the mind and body to really endow what you're doing with your own personal feelings," Rosenlieb said.

Rosenlieb's residency also included a week of master classes that ended today. His expertise extended into multiple areas of dance, from jazz to ballet, and were open to dancers of all levels. "Teaching is something I love to do," Rosenlieb said, and added that he is possibly looking towards teaching in the future.

The students reciprocated with high praises of Rosenlieb's talent and creativity. Katharine Plitnik '96, a member of the Bucknell Dance Company, said, "The experience of working with the professionalism of someone like Todd is irreplacable."

The Bucknell Dance Company will also premiere an original piece of Rosenlieb's in their fall dance concert. The piece will be set in jazz to "Dream Come True" by the Brand New Heavy's. Currently in the process of being choreographed, the piece promises more of Rosenlieb's signature flamboyant style and finesse.

As a freshman at Bucknell, Rosenlieb entered the dance company before the program had been incorporated into the department of theatre. Rosenlieb witnessed the rapid development of the company, including the addition of Danna Frangione, advisor to the dance company and professor of dance, and Shellie Cash-Muller, another professor of dance.

It was during his junior year that Rosenlieb became increasingly involved in dance, and in particular choreography. Since then he has premiered no less than eleven pieces at Bucknell.

Rosenlieb likes to explore different, and often controversial issues in his work. His piece "Suggestions" premiered in the Bucknell Dance Company's fall concert last year, and included two men kissing on stage.

"People really weren't prepared for that," Roselieb said, but he thought it was important to highlight issues that people may not be ready or willing to face. "I like to ask people 'Is what you see really real?'"

A 1992 graduate of New York University's Tisch School for the Arts with an MFA in Dance Performance, Rosenlieb maintained a strong connection with the campus throughout his three years of graduate school. He continued to work closely with the department of theatre and dance, and more specifically with the Bucknell Dance Company. A reoccuring presence on campus, Rosenlieb has returned at least once a semester since his graduation to work with the company or choreograph pieces for them.

His decision to return this year as an artist-in-residence was the logical evolution of his contribution to the school. "It seemed the natural progression," Rosenlieb said.

Rosenlieb was recently elected to the Bucknell Association for the Arts, which funds many of the events in the department of theatre and dance.

Currently Rosenlieb is teaching in New York and New Jersey at The Printing House Studio and Dance Incorporated. Producer Lou Rogers agreed to sponsor a piece from Rosenlieb after seeing the Bucknell Dance Company's fall concert last year. Rosenlieb is working on that project with composer Tom Fraoli and choreographer/dancer Barb Grubel to be premiered at the Samford Miesner Theatre in New York.

He is also choreographing a work entitled "Dinner Party" with Kim Wittam, who performed at Bucknell last year in Rosenlieb's piece "Suggestionstions." "Dinner Party" is being commissioned by the dance company at Montclair University in New Jersey.

But in spite of his promising career, Rosenlieb remains grateful to Bucknell and the dance company for the artistic opportunities they afforded him. "They (Bucknell) have always supported my ideas, intellectual and production wise, to the hilt. It's a remarkable position to be in as an artist."

Concert Review

Corea performance delights

By Katie DeBonneville
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Chick Corea and his Akoustic Band + One performed last Saturday at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. With Corea at the piano, John Patitucci on bass, Peter Erskine on drums, and Bob Berg on the tenor saxophone, the audience was treated to an evening filled with animated performances by the charismatic entertainers.

The group opened with a fast-paced piece which immediately exhibited the musicians' love for performing. Although all of the performers were showcased in solos during the evening, they also worked well together as an ensemble.

The Akoustic Band + One is marked by intensity–each member became physically involved with the music. Corea, dressed in a salmon-colored suit with a turquoise shirt and sneakers, didn't stop tapping his feet throughout the entire concert. This enthusiasm was even more evident than in Patitucci whose fingers flew over the strings of the bass as he rocked back and forth with his instrument.

Corea introduced the second tune of the evening as, "a new tune that doesn't have a title, so we call it the 'New Waltz.'" The opening of the piece afforded Corea the chance to display his skills at improvising ballad-style. As the song progressed, it took on the Latin rhythms considered characteristic of Corea who played under Latin bandleaders early in his career.

The final piece of the first set was prefaced by Corea as being, "inspired by a horse that walked into a bar and waited for a drink when the bartender asked, 'Why the long face?'" This up tempo piece opened with a keyboard solo that utilized the instrument's full range. A constant drumbeat in the background suggested the sound of a galloping horse Perhaps this is what prompted Corea's horse reference?

The second set began with another Latin-inspired piece that likewise demonstrated Berg's improvisational skills in all ranges of the tenor saxophone. The bright chords used by Corea in the piano solos again reflected his Latin influence.

Corea's "Three Miniatures" for bass and piano showed another side of the bass. Patitucci's use of a bow instead of a pick drew out the deep, rich tones of the instrument. The second of Corea's "Three Miniatures" took on a conversational tone between the bass and piano. In this interchange, both instruments had a great deal to say, and although they often overlapped, the individual message of both instruments came through. Although the third miniature brought in Berg and Erskine, the constant moving bass line in the piano retained the continuity of the piece.

The last "official" piece of the evening showed Corea's musical versatility. Known for being an improvisational pianist, Corea became a percussionist as well, playing chimes and woodblocks in addition to the piano. An unusual aspect of this piece was Corea's playing the strings on the inside of the piano in the style of the late John Cage. The style created a drum-like effect in some cases and a tone similar to that of a harpsichord in others. The piece won Corea and his ensemble its first standing ovation of the evening.

The following encore ended in a second ovation for the Akoustic Band + One. Corea and his ensemble met with members of the audience after the concert and signed autographs. An entertainer renowned for his performances, Corea met the expectations of his audience with the talent and showmanship of one of the great jazz musicians of our time.

Bison leave Brown black and blue, 33-14

Matt Walsh '93 and Mark Gentile '95 combine to score five touchdowns, help Bucknell snap four-year homecoming losing streak

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It was bragging rights day last Saturday as all six Patriot League football teams squared off against rivals from the Ivy League. In the end, the Ivies showed that while they may not be as dominant in the classrooms any longer, they can still rule on the gridiron. The patsies from the Patriot League only managed to win one of the six contests, and that victory happened right here in Lewisburg.

The Bison battered the Brown Bears, 33-14, before a small homecoming crowd that braved the afternoon's gloomy weather. Bucknell's offensive line paved the way for a relentless running attack. A 241-113 ground gain advantage helped the Bison control the clock as well as the score. They were able to run 21 more plays than Brown, and they possessed the ball for almost ten more minutes.

"I'm very proud of this football team," said head coach Lou Maranzana. "We had every opportunity to hang our heads [after their 24-21 loss to Towson State on Sept. 19], but we came back and finally put everything together."

The offense set the tone for the afternoon on its first drive of the game. Tailback Matt Walsh '93 carried the ball nine times, including seven in a row, pounding his way through the line to eventually put the Bison in field goal range. Although Justin Frick '94 missed the ensuing 32-yarder, the Bison were confident they could move the football.

After a Brown punt, Walsh carried the ball seven more times, capping a 52-yard drive with a one-yard touchdown run. After another defensive stand, Walsh caught a touchdown pass from ten yards out to give the Bison a 14-0 lead.

On the day, Walsh carried the ball 26 times for 106 yards, his second consecutive 100-yard game. Walsh now has 910 yards rushing for his career, and he will look to go over the 1,000-yard mark tomorrow at Dartmouth.

Quarterback Travis Kopp '95 had another outstanding game at the helm. Kopp completed 17 of 21 passes for 212 yards in three quarters. The sophomore did not have a pass intercepted once again, and he has had just one picked off in 88 attempts this year. His quarterback rating climbed to 172.3, which ranks him third in Division I-AA.

Kopp was also named the Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week.

After a Brown scoring drive cut the score to 14-7, Kopp led another long drive. The key plays were a third-down pass to Joe Vargo '93 and a fourth-and-three scramble by Kopp to keep the drive alive. Finally, with only 53 seconds left in the half, Kopp found his tight end Mark Gentile '95 for his first of two touchdowns on the day. The drive covered 67 yards on 14 plays and consumed over five minutes. Frick missed the extra point, however, and so the Bison took a 20-7 lead to the locker room.

Another TD pass from Kopp to Gentile and a one-yard run by Walsh capped the scoring, as the Bison rolled, 33-14. Gentile had a great game for a guy who started out as the number three or four quarterback in the preseason. His two touchdowns on Saturday, along with his touchdown and two-point conversion the week before against Towson State, now rank him second on the team in scoring with 20 points. He was also named the Patriot League Rookie of the Week.

Maranzana was pleased with his team's effort. "Travis [Kopp] is really coming along, " said Maranzana. "He's more relaxed and confident, and he's able to make things happen. He made some real key throws when we needed them. The offensive line also did a great job."

That offensive line, led by Jeff Hart '93, Don Watson '94, Eric Rutter '93, Craig Knauer '93, and Ed Fratterelli '95, is coming into its own. The line has now played 14 games together, and they are a huge reason why Bucknell's offense is up 48 percent from last year.

The defense also showed improvement last week. The lopsided score allowed many players to see action, and several stood out. Safety Kirk Bosse '94 made four tackles, including two outstanding stops on special teams. The leading tackler on the day was reserve linebacker Jeremy Patty '95, who made five stops.

Tomorrow the Bison will stay in the Ivy League as they travel to Dartmouth (1-1), Maranzana's alma mater. The Big Green, who have won Ivy championships each of the last two years, returns just five starters from last year's team.

Dartmouth, who defeated Bucknell 34-16 last year, should be slightly favored in this one. Dartmouth's quarterback, Jay Fiedler, has already thrown seven touchdown passes this year, and he will lead the team's high-powered offense, which has scored 36 and 27 points in their first two games. This should be a high-scoring affair, and Dartmouth's main advantage could Fullback Joe Vargo '93 scampered for 30 yards on just four carries, including a 10-yard jaunt, in helping the Bison ground game take control and propel the team to a Homecoming victory. The Bison running game showed its prowess by compiling a total of 220 yards on 57 carries for an average of 3.8 yards per carry.

Whitey Berardinelli '93 receives the snap and Jason Frick '94 boots an extra point through the uprights last weekend during the homecoming game against Brown. The Bison kicking game has been lackluster thus far this season, missing all three of its field goal tries and 5 of 12 extra point attempts.

Cross country men and women stride past Pitt

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Can you imagine running for over 25 minutes, only to have your entire meet come down to the final couple of yards?

While the women's cross country team breezed by Pitt 20-40, the men found themselves involved in one of the closest meets possible.

"It's fun to have one of these types of races every once in a while. I can still close my eyes and see the whole race again. It was a real nail-biter."
—Head coach Art Gulden

Trailing with only one mile remaining, the Bison youth shined as Eitan Tabak '94 and Steve Clarke '95 passed the Panthers' fifth runner (only the top five finishers for each team count in the scoring), enabling the Bison to squeak by with the narrowest of margins 27-28. Michael Bronson '93 was the first Bison to cross the finish line, taking second place.

However, there are always "enough ifs to make you turn green," said head coach Art Gulden. What if tri-captain Judd Jarden '93 doesn't finish one second ahead of a Panther for third place? What if Jim Farrer '93 doesn't edge out his opponent for fifth place by only a second? The answer to both questions is simply this: an end to Bucknell's newest winning streak, currently at 15 victories in a row.

"It's fun to have one of these types of races every once in a while," sighed Gulden. "I can still close my eyes and see the whole race again. It was a real nail-biter."

Gulden also pointed out that "there are no timeouts in cross country that would extend the agony and drama of such a close meet. It's all over in less than half an hour."

Was Pitt really that tough or did they just catch the Bison off-guard? "They always get up for us and make this a very competitive meet," answered Gulden. "Most everyone ran well and was focused. It was just a great meet."

Bucknell now owns a 3-1 series edge, but has never blown out the Panthers. "We both recruit the same runners, so we know each other well which makes the race that much more intense."

The women were more business-like in their relatively easy win, but it didn't start out that way. After the first half-mile, four of the first five runners were Pitt's.

"They could have lost their poise, but the ladies gained control of the meet by the mile mark," said a pleased Gulden. "This team's come a very long way and it was fun to see them challenge one another out there even after the race was over."

Captain Kristen Opdyke '93 cruised to an easy victory as she watched her teammates take four of the next six spots to nail down the victory. Kathy Wurster '94, Gina Abraham '93, and Maria Ryan '96 finished third through fifth, respectively. Jessica Wilhelm '95 rounded out Bucknell's scoring with her seventh place finish.

"They continue to have a great attitude about improving at both the individual and team level," said Gulden.

In summing up the weekend for both squads, Gulden said, "These were nice wins and good for the athletes because it forced them to extend themselves—the men for the whole race, and the women who overcame an early deficit."

With the conference championships now just four weeks away, it's getting close to crunch time.

"Both teams are ahead of their training schedules and better than I thought they'd be at this point," said Gulden. "We have a lot of potential and I think we're ready to break through to that next level, but the whole key is confidence."

The next step in getting ready for those championships will be taken tomorrow at Delaware. The women should have a tough meet on their hands against the Lady Blue Hens. The men, on the other hand, will leave some runners behind and rest up for the Indiana Invitational next weekend instead of blowing out Delaware and Drexel.

AT THE TAPE

At 2-1, the women's cross country team has already matched their victory total from the 1991 season, in which it was 2-4.

Women's soccer team battles Villanova to 1-1 tie

BY T.K. DRAPER AND BILL BROWN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

An outstanding effort by goalie Kim Fekel '93 and aggressive play by the defensive core allowed Bucknell's women's soccer team (4-3-1, 1-2) to tie Villanova 1-1 on Lewisburg turf this past Wednesday.

Both scores in the exciting deadlock took place within one minute of the last quarter of the game. At 26:23 of the second half, forward Lisa Gibbons '95 chased a loose ball down the sideline in Villanova's defensive zone and crossed the ball to forward Kerry McDonnell '96. McDonnell skillfully maneuvered the ball around two Wildcat defenders, leaving them on the ground behind her, and shot the ball into the top right corner of the net.

"After you score a goal, that's when you're most vulnerable."
—Midfielder Kara Patrick '96

Still on a high from scoring what appeared to be the game-winning shot, Bucknell was scored upon at 25:53 by Villanova attacker Sarah Levandusky. Bison midfielder Kara Patrick '96 explained, "After you score a goal, that's when you're most vulnerable." This was evident, as Bucknell sat back and watched the Wildcat forwards drive down the field and tuck the ball into the net.

The two squads played 25 more minutes of regulation and then 30 minutes of scoreless overtime. The overtime period once more highlighted the talents of Fekel, who played at the top of her game in preserving the tie for the Bison.

When asked about the lack of offense generated, Bucknell coach Toby Lovecchio said, " We had trouble. They were doing a good job of double- and triple-teaming Lisa [Gibbons], and obviously she is a big part of our offense."

Lovecchio stressed that the team definitely had to work on passing, which was evidently not very crisp and clean.

Lovecchio also commented on the hard-nosed play of Fekel and the defense, which has been keeping the team in some of these low scoring contests this season. Along with the passing, he felt that the midfield play needed a lot of work.

Stepping back and looking at the game from an overall perspective, however, Lovecchio was fairly pleased with the tie, considering last season's 5-0 massacre of the Bison at Villanova. "It [Villanova] was pretty much the same team as last year, " explained the coach. "For us, it was definitely a good result."

Last Saturday in Hamilton, NY, Bucknell went down in a close contest against Colgate 1-0. The Red Raiders allowed the Bison a meager two shots on goal, and completely shut down the Orange and Blue's leading scorer Gibbons. Colgate goalie Kristine Schuerger, who had shared a pair of shutouts already this season, earned her first solo success in the net by blanking Bucknell.

Looking ahead to the rest of the season, if the Bison want a chance at making the Patriot League playoffs, they must win either tonight against Army, or against Lafayette on Oct. 10. Lovecchio is very confident that his team can do this, and has recognized the confidence that the players have in themselves. Confidence and hard work is what the team will need to challenge many of the teams on the rest of Bucknell's schedule.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Midfielder Joanne Crane '95 brings the ball upfield in a home game earlier in the season. The team's next game will be tonight at 7:30 p.m. against Army on the road on Oct. 2.

Lisa Gibbons '95 is fifth in the nation and first in the Patriot League in scoring.

Field hockey battles weather to 1-1 split

Injuries to prominent starters lead to loss vs. Engineers; Bison rebound to defeat Cornell

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Defender Jennifer Hayes '93 fights for the ball against a Drexel opponent in Bucknell's overtime victory over the Dragons earlier this season. Bucknell plays Lehigh tomorrow at 1 p.m., at which time it will attempt to improve upon it .500 record.

The Bison ended yet another road trip this week with a 4-4 overall record. Last Sunday, Bucknell left Lewisburg with its sticks to play 10th-ranked Lafayette, and they returned home with injuries, wet uniforms, and a 2-0 loss. Under the far-from-ideal conditions of pouring rain, the Bison again had trouble putting points on the board.

Early in the first half, Sue Wells '93 was taken out of the game after a collision with a Lafayette player, which resulted in a mild concussion for the senior. Then, with about ten minutes left in the first half, Almira Baldwin '94 was hit between the eyes with a stick, and she too had to leave the game with an injury which later required stitches. With two starting line players out of the contest in the first half, things never got better as the Orange and Blue found it tough to score without a pair of its key starters.

her first of the season and the only goal of the game. With this assist, Baldwin continued her streak of figuring in on each one of Bucknell's goals this season.

As a result of her achievements on the field, Baldwin received the Patriot League Player of the Week

"I have never seen a field hockey game played in that kind of rain."
—Student trainer Wendy Schwieger '95

After the game, the Bucknell players felt disappointed because they probably could have won under other circumstances, especially the inclement weather.

"I have never seen a field hockey game played in that kind of rain," said the team's student trainer, Wendy Schwieger '95. Add to that the fact that two of Bucknell's starters were on the bench for much of the game, and one might wonder what could have happened under ideal conditions.

On Wednesday, Bucknell rebounded and came away with a 1-0 victory over Cornell University in the freezing cold of Ithaca, New York. Both Wells and Baldwin returned to the lineup, and Baldwin's presence was quickly felt as she assisted a Katrina Mueller '93 goal—distinction. The defense also came through when it was needed, and Danielle Ward '93 played a spectacular game in goal, shutting out Cornell. This win was the first Bison victory of the season on turf, and the first in four years for the seniors on the team.

Bucknell plays one of its few home games of the season tomorrow when it hosts Lehigh University at 2 p.m. After that match, they hit the road again next weekend for a six-day, three-game trip to California. Scheduled competiton includes Pacific on Saturday, Oct. 10, Stanford on Sunday, Oct. 11 and California on Tuesday, Oct. 13. All three games will be played at Stanford University.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

In an A-League soccer match this past week, Kappa Sigma brought down Chi Phi, 2-1. During halftime, World Cup sensation Diego Maradona made a surprise appearance when, amidst a drug-induced haze, he stumbled onto the field and mumbled, "Which way to Italia?" Lewisburg law enforcement officials led Maradona away before he could do further damage to his body as well as his reputation (See Public Safety Log, page 2). Above, Chi Phi halfback Dave Newcomb '93 sends the ball past the midfield stripe. The contest was knotted at 1-1 until halfway through the second half, when Kappa Sig put in the game-winning goal.

turn out to be its excellent kicking game. Dennis Durkin blasted two field goals of over 40 yards against Bucknell last year, and he could be the difference tomorrow.

Bucknell does not play at home again until Halloween, when Fordham comes to town.

A win tomorrow could really get the Bison rolling, as they play at hapless Columbia next weekend. Then, after a bye, Bucknell plays Holy Cross, who has looked awful in stumbling out to an 0-3 start. Fordham, who showed how bad they are by losing at home to Columbia last weekend, comes third in a stretch of three very winnable contests.

The team has the potential to come out of this easy stretch in their schedule with a few victories.

Alaskan teams give women's volleyball the cold shoulder

BY ERIC BIRNBAUM

Bucknell's Lady Spikers packed their bags this past week and headed north to the cold and desolate confines of Alaska. There the Bison (2-11) played four matches in four days against the University of Alaska at Anchorage and the University of Alaska at Fairbanks.

In Bucknell's first match against Anchorage, the team was outplayed and crushed in all three games, falling 15-2, 15-3, and 15-4. "I don't know what it was, but we were very tired from the trip and then we came right into the gym and played," said coach Cindy Opalski. "No doubt they were a real strong team, but I was definitely happier with our performance against them the next day."

The following day, the Lady Spikers fell to Anchorage a second time but faired slightly better. The team lost in straight games, 15-8, 15-7, 15-6, although a bright spot for the Bison was the play of captain Sarah Mesaros '93 and young star Katie Steele '96, who had 5 and 6 kills, respectively.

Following these two losses,

Steele once again took the lead for the young squad by recording an impressive 16 kills.

Bucknell searched for its first victory of the roadtrip as they went up against the University of Alaska-Fairbanks. Here the Bison proved to give their finest effort, even though they lost the first game 15-1 and the second game 15-7. In the third game, Bucknell put together a strong effort and came out victorious, prevailing 17-15.

However, Fairbanks fought back and beat the Orange and Blue 15-6 in the final game to take the match 3-1. Steele once again took the lead for the young squad by recording an impressive 16 kills.

In the final match of the roadtrip, Bucknell, looking to salvage at least one victory in the tundra, went up against Fairbanks again. Unfortunately, the team came short of its goal and lost in three straight games, 15-7, 15-3 and 15-4. The Lady Spiker offense sputtered as it recorded a mere 14 kills over the three games.

With the coming week's competition, the Bison will be entering a crucial part of their season. They begin by facing Navy and Robert Morris at home this weekend. Coach Opalski remains hopeful, saying, "This is when it all starts!"

JV Football moves to 2-0 with 31-0 spanking of Lycoming

BY ROSS FEINGOLD

This past Monday night in Lewisburg, the JV Bison football team shut out a clearly inferior squad from Lycoming, 31-0. In what is hopefully a positive sign of development for Bison football, Bucknell easily defeated the Division II squad with a combination of strong offense and stingy defense.

In the early going, neither offense could put anything together. In fact, it was the Bison defense that put up the first points. With 5:45 to go in the first quarter, and after a Bison punt and tight defense put Lycoming on its own five, opposing quarterback Craig Hook could not find an open receiver and was called for intentionally grounding the ball in the end zone, thereby giving the Bison a safety and a 2-0 lead.

In the final minute of the quarter, after Lycoming had trouble handling a Bison punt and was forced to start from their one, a pitch to the Lycoming tailback did not connect and the ensuing fumble was recovered by Ed Burman '96 in the end zone for a touchdown. The recovery was to be the first of three for Burman on the night.

In a turn of events that was reminiscent of Bucknell's varsity special teams woes this season, the point-after attempt went wide right.

The second quarter saw the Bison continue their dominance, this time on both sides of the ball. After a 35-yard drive led by the passing of quarterback Pete Harteveld '96 (7 for 15, 127 yards) and the rushing of Peter Gorski '96 put the Bison on the Lycoming four, a failed fourth down conversion gave the ball back to Lycoming. However, Bucknell's tight defense against the pass forced another safety, and so the Bison defense moved out to a 10-0 lead over Lycoming and their own offensive team as well.

Faced with the dilemma of "losing" to the defense, Harteveld came out throwing on the next possession.

"Our running game was going well, so we decided to work on our passing," said Gorski, who rushed for 67 yards.

Faced with the dilemma of "losing" to the defense, Harteveld came out throwing on the next possession. On the first play from scrimmage on his own 34, he hit Matt Curran '96 for an eight-yard gain and then followed that up with a beautiful pass to John Sakowski '96 for a 58-yard touchdown reception. In a bit of daring, the Bison then faked the extra point and Mike Phillips '96, the holder, grabbed the ball and ran it in for a two-point conversion.

The next Bison touchdown was again set up by fine passing from Harteveld and the dexterity of Sakowski. From the Lycoming 42, Harteveld unleashed a pass that Sakowski pulled in with a diving grab at the visitors' four. The drive was capped off by a Darren Bloch '96 four-yard run for the touchdown, and this time Erik Steiler '96 made the extra point for a 25-0 lead.

The scoring concluded with another pass play, this time at the hands of Bison quarterback Andy Amrhein '94, who hit Curran for a 32-yard touchdown reception. The extra point, however, was missed again.

Speculation amongst the fans in the fourth quarter centered around whether the Bison could preserve the shutout, and the defense did not disappoint the crowd. Led by the outstanding play of Burman, who rung up 1.5 sacks on the evening, the defense held Lycoming to 59 total yards of offense. Said Brien Davis '96, who also had a strong game on defense with one sack, "We trounced them."

Doug Dollenberg '94

Men's golfer Doug Dollenberg '94 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of Oct. 2 after shooting a two under par game of 70 in the Susquehanna Fall Classic. His game was the best score by a Bucknell golfer since April 1976, when Chick Wagner shot a two under par 68 at the Bucknell Country Club.

Following this performance, Dollenberg recorded a second-place finish in the ECAC qualifying tournament this past week. The junior co-captain is majoring in chemical engineering and hails from Lutherville, MD.

Golf team excels at Gettysburg, ECAC tourneys

BY JONATHAN BORDEAU

After encouraging results at the Franklin and Marshall Invitational and The Susquehanna Fall Classic, the Bison golf team tallied equally good results at the Gettysburg Invitational on Monday. Against a field nine teams strong, Bucknell placed second, six strokes behind York College and eight strokes ahead of host Gettysburg. Co-captain Doug Dollenberg '94 notched a team-high round of 74, which was good enough for the third-highest round at the tournament. Co-captain Dave Fries '93 and Jeff Graf '96 shot well, each tallying rounds of 76.

Coach Tommy Thompson was pleased with the squad's performance at Gettysburg, and emphasized the consistent play of Dollenberg: "I am happy with the scores at Gettysburg. [Dollenberg] continues to play well, following his super round last week."

At the Susquehanna Fall Classic, played at the Pines Country Club in Edgewood, Dollenberg captured top honors from a field of 105 golfers. His round of 70 is tops amongst Bucknell golfers since 1987, when Tom DeRigo shot a 70 at the Eastern Championships that year." I was excited about my round," said Dollenberg. "I was also glad to see things come together and to do something I knew I could do."

Consistent play, like that of Dollenberg's, is what Bison golfers will need heading into the final stages of the fall season.

"We hope to finish strong and finish on a high note," said Coach Thompson. "We need good performances at these last few tournaments to have confidence going into the spring [season]."

"We definitely have a shot at qualifying for the ECAC's. The team is starting to show its depth and we are playing at a caliber of play consistent with our talent."

—Co-captain Doug Dollenberg '94

Thompson is pleased with the development that he has seen in his players over the last four tournaments. Bucknell's scoring has followed a steady improvement since the Georgetown Invitational (the team average dropped from 81.5 strokes at Georgetown to a much improved 76.8 strokes at Gettysburg), and, over the last three tournaments, Bison golfers have steadily improved individually, notching totals of 334, 324, and, most recently, 314 at the Gettysburg Invitational.

Scoring consistency, as Coach Thompson sees it, is one of the many goals of the season that the team has already satisfied. "Everyone is doing a good job. The team is developing depth. I am very pleased with the way the players are treating a largely individual sport as a team effort."

Yesterday, the Bison golfers hit the links at the ECAC Qualifiers. The top two qualifiers at the tournament move on to the ECAC Fall Championship, played on Oct. 10 and 11. Going into the tournament, Temple, I.U.P., and the University of Maryland at Baltimore County (UMBC) were considered the favorites for the top two spots. The Bison team went into the contest confident.

"We definitely have a shot at qualifying for the ECAC's, " said Dollenberg. "The team is starting to show its depth and we are playing at a caliber of play consistent with our talent. We need to play well in order to qualify—I am confident that we can do it."

Coach Thompson sees his squad as having a very realistic chance to finish its fall season at the Fall Championships. Despite the fact that the team played well, they had to settle for a third place finish 15 strokes behind second place I.U.P and 17 strokes behind first place Temple.

Once again, Dollenberg gave a magnificent performance on his way to a 74-stroke game which at the end of 18 holes placed him in a first-place tie with an opponent from Temple. The two dueled for the top spot through three playoff holes, yet on the fourth hole Dollenberg finally bowed to his competitor.

The Bison golfers will travel up to West Point to play in the West Point Tournament Oct. 3 and 4.

the basic motif of leaving home and struggling to return—the same theme that Homer uses in The Odyssey. The quest for home base rather than the conquest of land. Now I realize why The Iliad has less appeal for me than The Odyssey.

I don't know whether women feel comfortable hanging out in the dugout, but for me as a woman at a football strategy session or a football practice, gender makes a difference. I felt as out of place as a man might at a quilting party or—until recent years—in a birthing room. I wonder if women rugby players would experience what I did.

Such separation by gender is not a common experience for me. Despite a single-sex education, I grew up participating in male activities—but of a different sort.

As a child on a large farm in Virginia, I spent my days with the men, working on the hay wagons, by ten years old driving tractors, tending animals. Tomboy that I was, I learned to hunt and flycast with the males. Later I rode competitively in horseshows with men. As a single woman in Lewisburg, I have run my own little mini-farm, raising animals, landscaping and gardening strenuously, maintaining and repairing my farm equipment. I have prided myself as equal to any man in these activities. But my old experiences did not translate into the football activities of last week. The themes of domestic life and agriculture in The Odyssey are different from strategies of warfare in The Iliad.

I do not imply that I was not treated splendidly during my week as sideline coach. Bucknell has a staff of gracious and intelligent coaches who did everything they could to make me comfortable; they were exceedingly courteous, pressed me to ask questions, attempted valiantly to explain the game to an illiterate. But they were also mildly amused, even bemused, by my presence. The players as well. They smiled shyly, nodded their heads at the practice, but a tiny twist at the corner of their mouths, a swift glance at a compatriot, gave away that they figured I was off my beat. I remained an outsider.

On Saturday on the sidelines, the game's intensity got through to me, albeit with some ambivalence. I recalled that a coach had told me that at the beginning of each game he can't imagine doing anything else in the world—he wants only to be there, on that field, with only one desire: to win. But even while I enjoyed the excitement, I found myself cringing at the thwack-k-k, the thud, as human beings slammed into plastic armour, or unprotected flesh and bones. Like a field of armadillos in mating season.

That coach's desire to win is alien to me, and here also I felt myself an outsider, a female with very little competitive spirit. I confess that when Brown made a touchdown in the last eight seconds I felt some gratification. I realized that I experience most of my life in softer gradations ranging from not-so-good to excellent—not winning or losing.

The greatest surprise for me was halftime in the locker room. Having been gently advised by numerous men that I might overhear rough language when I followed the team inside at halftime, I anticipated some robust and foul expressions—maybe even some new terms, though I doubted it. Not the case.

With their face guards and helmets removed, those anonymous brutes from the playing field were transformed back into the young men who sit in my classes—some of them just kids. They sat quietly in groups, others to the side by themselves. Although there were some quiet comments, the tone was downright meditative. One guy stared into space in a yoga trance, for a least ten minutes. Another seemed to be in prayer, chin in his hands. They were all at rest, deep in their own thoughts. For those few minutes the sport was revealed to me in entirely new terms.

Seconds before halftime ended, the tone changed when coaches outlined a bit of strategy and then spurred the team to victory with words carefully chosen to energize and charge them with a mission. It was a nice moment, that shift from meditation to action.

I enjoyed being a sideline coach for a week, and I learned more than I ever expected to. Will I be in Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium hereafter for home games? I doubt it. Autumn is my time to rake and shred maple leaves, prepare vegetable gardens, transplant perennials. Or I might be at the Met on a Saturday afternoon—the Met, not Mets, or Jets—but where the fat lady sings indoors and the band marches to Verdi's Aida.

when Rider comes rolling into town. After Rider, the team will have a week's rest before playing three Patriot League games within seven days (Lafayette, Army and Fordham). If the Bison can continue to play throughout the rest of the season as well as they played against the Red Raiders, they still have a chance to gain ground in the Patriot League. Currently, all three of these teams are ahead of Bucknell in the standings.

A view from the outside

Not only did I attend the homecoming game last Saturday, I was the sideline coach. Admirers say it was I who pressed the team to victory.

I haven't a reputation on campus as a great booster of team sports. In fact, the last football game I attended was forty years ago, at the University of Virginia on a weekend away from Hollins, the woman's college I attended. Maybe I saw a couple of other games before that—I can't remember. In recent years I have occasionally halted before a television screen and tried to make sense of scurrying, slamming figures, obscenely immense, faceless, usually ending up in a pile on a muddy field.

All I knew about football was that the field has a fifty yard line where much of the action is and that fans pay a bundle to sit there.

But in this increasingly sports-crazed world I have felt steadily more out of touch. Everyone was incredulous at my total ignorance of team sports. Concluding that I needn't LIKE the game, but that I should know something about it, I volunteered to be a football sideline coach.

This program, initiated at Bucknell by athletic director Rick Hartzell in 1989, now covers all 26 varsity sports, and something like 100 faculty and administration men and women have participated. The program has served to break down some of the unnatural barriers between sports and academic life, receiving considerable national attention in the press as an innovative program.

My schedule began with a Tuesday night observation of the coaches as they reviewed Brown's games on film, studied the data on its team, and then developed strategy. Thursday afternoon I attended a practice, and on Satuday I took my position on the sideline with coaches, trainers, and team members. I wasn't likely to become an expert from these brief exposures, but this introduction to the sport allowed me to get some notion of the complexity of the game. And it is complex, beginning with the strategy sessions.

Le nouveau football—like modern warfare—depends heavily on technology. A wall of computers and video machines provide coaches with printouts on opponents and videos of their games, and then, with an arcane language, they merge modern technology with the cabals, developing their coded plans. Only a highly trained spy could carry off their secret strategy.

Out on the field, when these plans are instructed to the team in highly organized practice sessions, the drill-sergeant coaches bark instructions in ritualistic cadences. They press players into action with a balance of exhortation, praise, and sometimes admonishment. The team doesn't participate in planning strategy, I learned, nor does it disagree. Players on the field take orders.

This sport, as everyone knows, is based on the taking of territory: its model is warfare, deadly serious, often dangerous. The game depends not on instantaneous decisions by experienced athletes but on strategy dictated by experts who are authoritarian, autocratic—perhaps might suggest, anachronistically feudal. And like any feudal system, the team functions best through the engenderment of loyalty and allegances, both to the chieftians and among the warriors. Individuality is dangerous.

I once read that Bart Giamatti described his favorite team sport as having

Tennis rampage continues to 8-0

The Lady Bison proceed down unbeaten path in 1992 as they shrug off Delaware, Colgate, Lock Haven

BY DAN TARDITI
Bucknellian Staff Writer

One weird event after another seems to be the norm for Bucknell's unbeaten women's tennis team. After playing two matches on the same day last week, the team played indoors during a week in which it faced off against Delaware and Colgate at home.

"It was a complete change," said Sara Allen '96. "It was much faster, but we [she and her opponent] were both playing on it, so I guess no one really had an advantage."

> "I wasn't expecting to play, and it was my first number one match at doubles so I was really nervous. It was a tough match, but I think it was good experience."
> —Adina Junge '96

Bucknell began its 2-0 week by cruising past the Blue Hens of Delaware, 7-2. These two wins raised its season record to an impressive 7-0 (4-0 in Patriot League). Big victories by Julia Diaz '95 over Megan Zusi (7-5,6-1) and a dominating performance by Kristina Lutter '95 over Julia Kratzer (6-0,6-1) helped lead the team to an easy victory. Kymm Carlson '94, who lost a tough match, 5-7, 1-6, was playing sick. Carlson was feeling so under the weather, in fact, that coach Rose Ewan sent her home to rest up for the upcoming Colgate match.

All other singles players won in straight sets. Lauren Weihl '96 took a well-played but difficult three-set match. She rallied from being down one set to win 5-7, 6-1, 6-4, over Delaware's Krista Gray. Freshman Sara Allen won over Amy Gupko, 6-3, 6-2 on what she described as "a much faster surface than any indoor court I had played on before." Meanwhile, Erika Anhood '96 recovered from her first loss of the season last week to win 6-4, 6-1 over Allison Ashurst.

In doubles play, the women had trouble in first doubles competition, but won all the rest in straight sets. Without her normal partner Carlson, Diaz teamed up with Adina Junge '96 and lost 1-6, 1-6.

"I wasn't expecting to play, and it was my first number one match at doubles so I was really nervous," Junge said. "It was a tough match, but I think it was a good experience."

The tandem of Weihl and Allen won easily 6-4, 6-0, while Lutter and Christine McMillan '95 were victorious 6-1, 6-4.

On Sunday, the women dominated over Colgate, a team that was supposed to be their toughest competition in the Patriot League, by a count of 5-1. Diaz won a three-set affair, 4-6, 6-3, 6-4, over Red Raider Sue Monajati.

As Diaz described her match, "The second set was my set. I wanted it really badly, which made the difference."

Lutter won again, 6-1, 6-3, over Shanon Flanagan, but Weihl played another tough match and lost after an extended third set, 6-2, 2-6, 5-7, to Sara Eckert.

"Lauren's a really tough player, and she played a tough match," said teammate Sara Allen of Weihl. "The other girl was just really steady and consistent." Allen won a challenging second set to win over Marge Brenner, 6-1, 7-5, and Anhood cruised to victory, 6-1, 6-3, over Katie Grimes.

In doubles action, all games were played in pro sets, in which the first player to take eight games in a set is the winner. Diaz was reunited with a healthy Carlson, and they went on to win 8-7 (7-4). Weihl and Allen lost a well-played match, 6-8. Finally, Lutter and McMillan dominated, 8-1.

Men's soccer undergoes another tough week

Bucknell remains winless in the Patriot League at 0-3 after losses at the hands of Colgate and Bloomsburg

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Once more, it was a week of ups and downs. On Saturday, the Bucknell men's soccer team played what was perhaps their best game of the year against Colgate, the team that currently stands atop the Patriot League standings. The Bison, however, were victims of extremely poor officiating, and lost a tough game in double overtime to the Red Raiders 1-0. Bucknell, who held heavily-favored Colgate scoreless through regulation and most of both overtimes, proved that they can run with anyone.

The "downs" came on Tuesday, as Bucknell fell to local foe Bloomsburg 1-0. The two losses dropped the Bison to .500, at 4-4, and 0-3 in the Patriot League.

Despite the two defeats, the Bison have to be pleased with their performance on Saturday. The Bison deserved a win just as much as Colgate, but this one was snatched away from them. The officiating was, at best, poor. The referee issued eight bookings—which illustrates a lack of control on his part—and while the Bison were slapped with half of these penalties (including an unjust ejection of Brian Buck '95 in the closing minutes of the final overtime), they were clearly not the instigators of the afternoon's foul play.

Colgate players who could not find a way to play the ball fairly instead chose to play the legs of the Bison, and were rarely called; however, if a Bucknell player retaliated, he was swiftly reprimanded. If one believes in home field advantage, the Bison were definitely playing an away game.

The referee seemed to spend more time telling enthusiastic homecoming fans to back off of the sideline than he did worrying about the game at hand. When he did find the strength to reach for his whistle, his calls were often poorly timed or erroneous.

Early in the second half, the Bison managed to sidestep the official and Colgate miscreants and had a great opportunity to score. Jon MacKenzie '93 took the ball down the middle, and was supported well on both sides. As he passed the ball perfectly to his left, he was tripped up by a Colgate defender. Under the rules of soccer, play should have been allowed to continue, because the offense (in this case Bucknell) had a bona fide scoring chance. The referee, however, called the foul, and the Bison's best scoring chance of the game was nullified.

Seven of the eight booking were cautions, and all of these cautions were for the same offense: ungentlemanly conduct. This suggests—and every spectator, player and coach would agree—that the referee did not have control of the game.

The eighth booking, an ejection, was entirely unfounded. Brian Buck, while pursuing a Colgate midfielder, tripped him. While the foul may or may not have been inadvertent, it was definitely not an ejectionable offense. Buck obviously was thinking this as, when the play was whistled dead, he walked away, expecting at worst another caution. Instead, Buck was sent off, his teammates protested vehemently, and the crowd echoed a resounding chorus of boos.

Understandably, when approached about the officiating, Bison players declined to comment.

Despite the great disappointment of the loss, the Bison came away with several positive notes from this game. Despite allowing a goal in the closing moments of overtime, keeper Mark Wrigley '94 continued his excellent work in the net. He has come into his own as a leader on the team, and has proven that he can effectively take charge in the defensive sector of the field. The rest of the defense played very well also.

Most importantly, the Bison played as a team, with good communication, well-timed passes, and overall play that is indicative of general cohesiveness.

On Tuesday, the Bison beat Bloomsburg in almost every category; unfortunately, the Bison came up short in the most important offensive category: goals. The Bison were again defeated 1-0 despite outshooting Bloomsburg 14-7, and receiving two more corner kicks. Also, the Bison forced the Bloomsburg keeper to make almost twice as many saves as Wrigley.

Bucknell will have the opportunity to improve on its overall record tomorrow

President Sojka announces environmental task force

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG AND DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writers

While introducing last night's Environmental Imperative lecture, President Gary Sojka announced the recent appointment of an environmental task force in order to "move, seriously and collectively, towards the greening of Bucknell." Barry Commoner, whom Sojka called a "ground-breaker" in environmental issues, addressed a full audience last night in Vaughan Literature Auditorium as part of the continuing President's Forum lecture series.

According to Mary Evelyn Tucker, associate professor of religion and co-chair of the task force, the point of this series of the President's Forum is to talk about ecology and sustainable development from different points of view.

Sojka stated that the speakers brought to campus through the Environmental Imperative have "far exceeded [his] expectations for the ability to affect the life of this campus." The special task force on the environment was created to allow for the sustainable growth in the quality of Bucknell's programs. The group will be comprised of students, faculty, administration and staff.

"In recent years students have become increasingly aware of and active in environmental issues," said Karen Laffler, recycling coordinator. "The task force will bring faculty, administration and staff together with students to bring about a real possibility for positive change."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

University President Gary Sojka said that the "greening" task force will move Bucknell in the direction of sustainable growth.

Recognizing the significance of the economic problems facing the country today, Commoner focused his remarks on the relationship between the environment and the economy, stating, "there's no way to improve the environment without improving the economy." In discussing his plans for the University's future, Sojka addressed this link between the economy and the environment and said that he believed sustainable growth can be achieved in a fiscally responsible way.

"In preparing for today's discussion of the greening of corporations, several members of the faculty talked to President Sojka about our concern that we should be focussing on the greening of Bucknell as well," said Tucker. "This kind of an effort has both economic impact and leadership potential for Bucknell. Namely, by looking at energy and lighting costs, recycling, and cutting waste we can not only save the University money but we can also show initiative for environmental programs at academic institutions."

The work of Steve Stamos, professor of international relations; Paul Shrivastava, professor of management; Warren Abrahamson, professor of biology, as well as Tucker has been instrumental in bringing about this initiative.

Commoner stressed that there is not a contradiction between wanting to help both the economy and the environment, and claimed that the apparent contradiction between them is a result of the way our society has attempted to protect the environment. He faulted the current practice of regulation, stating instead, "the way to really get improvement [in the environment] is not to produce the pollutants in the first place."

The practice of regulation and control of pollutants is doomed to fail, according to Commoner, as this is an "attempt to deal with the pollution problem that becomes progressively more costly the better job you try to do." Therefore, there is an economic limit to how well this method can

Faculty passes re-calendaring proposal

Spring semester shifted to begin on or after January 15 allowing for earlier finish to academic year

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The faculty voted by an overwhelming majority at October's faculty meeting to adopt a re-calendaring plan which will lengthen each semester to 70 instructional days and will shift the start of the spring semester to a date on or after January 15.

The change in the number of instructional days represents an increase of 2.5 days in the fall semester and 3 days in the spring semester; the earlier starting date for second semester will move the last day of spring finals to between May 8 and 14.

Modification to the calendar was prompted by last semester's removal of the January Program.

The adopted plan was presented by Ben Marsh, chairperson of the Committee on Instruction, as a three-part motion outlining the major considerations in the development of the new system.

Marsh cited a variety of reasons for the increase in instructional days including the ability to work at a more appropriate pace and the ability to cover more material within a given course.

In addition, Marsh expressed the committee's belief that there are benefits to a semester with a whole number of weeks.

"There is something logical about having a whole number of weeks in a semester," said Marsh. "It means that anything that happens once a week will happen every week."

Marsh stated that the move to a 70-day semester puts Bucknell in line with its frame-of-reference schools with regard to length of instructional period and makes a statement to the world beyond Bucknell that the institution will provide a consistently high level of student contact and will not be offering less "value" in comparison to the current calendar.

The committee's rationale for moving the start of the spring semester to the third week of January was that it would allow honors students three weeks to work on individual projects, provide at least three full weeks between semesters for faculty course preparation and scholarly work, and would push back the spring sports schedule and other outside activities toward better weather.

Michael Payne, chair and professor of English, spoke in favor of the motion citing the ability to utilize the time between semesters as the reason for his support.

"If I read the motion correctly, you have presented us with...the possibility of salvaging bits of the Jan Plan," said Payne. "If that is correct I think we should pass this."

However, several members of the faculty voiced concern over problems the new spring semester schedule would create.

Vice President for Student Services Barbara Shailor questioned Marsh on whether the committee had considered the effect the loss of January and the early finish of the second semester would have on co-curricular activities, especially sports.

Marsh responded that the committee had looked at such factors as the early end of baseball season but added that "many of our frame-of-reference schools have encountered the same problems and have worked them out."

Shailor, however, noted that such solutions may involve substantial costs. "Colgate and Lehigh do work through these problems," said Shailor, "but at a loss to the students who are not able to participate in championships."

Charles Longley, professor of political science, questioned the need for the three weeks between semesters that would be created by this proposal.

"If one rationale was to allow students to get into the marketplace earlier, how much are we really helping them do that?" Longley asked. "Why don't we start January 3 and get on with it?"

Longley also questioned the need for a ten-day gap between the

Traci Mellinger— The Bucknellian

Michael Payne, professor of English, supported the motion and commended the Committee for preserving, in part, the opportunity for faculty development lost with the removal of the Jan Plan.

Pamphlet outlines terms of academic responsibility

BY ALISA BLAND AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Last spring the faculty members of the New Student Orientation Committee, and Debra Mathinos, then chair of the Board on Academic Responsibility, discussed various ways to address the issue of academic responsibility, especially concerning first-year students.

They decided to present the issue in a new manner as a means of preventing the all-too-common claim of ignorance on the part of many students accused of academic irresponsibility.

> The pamphlet "gives faculty a starting point for discussing academic responsibility with the students."
> —Debra Mathinos, assistant professor of education

As defined in the pamphlet Academic Responsibility at Bucknell, academic irresponsibility "is a term used to designate a wide range of academic conduct which violates trust, honor, and integrity." This type of conduct includes cheating, plagiarism and misuse of computing facilities.

Pamphlets containing definitions and examples of academic irresponsibility were distributed to all students through campus mail. Extra copies of the pamphlet are available in the deans' offices.

The policy on academic responsibility is not new to the University. "It is a policy that has always existed," said Maureen Murphy, associate dean of arts and sciences. "We reworked the examples that were previously used in order to make it easier for the students to know what their academic responsibilities are," said Murphy.

"I think the brochure will open up communications between students and faculty," said Debra Mathinos, member of the Board of Review on Academic Responsibility. According to Mathinos the pamphlet "gives faculty a starting point for discussing academic responsibility with the students."

As well as explaining academic irresponsibility, the pamphlet also outlines the procedures to be followed in suspected cases of academic irresponsibility. After gathering all pertinent information, members of the faculty are to report possible instances of academic irresponsibility to the associate dean of the college to which the student is enrolled.

At this point in the process, the associate dean will meet with the student, explain the charge and procedures and prepare a written summary of the meeting. During this meeting the student may be accompanied by another member of the Bucknell community. The faculty member and student both submit written statements concerning the incident to the associate dean. Both statements along with the summary of the meeting are then sent to the registrar.

The students will then be brought before the Board of Review on Academic Responsibility. The board is composed of three faculty members serving 3 year staggered terms, one female student, and one male student. All members of the board are elected through the Bucknell Student Government.

After determining whether a violation occurred the board informs the associate dean of its decision as well as a recommendation for an appropriate penalty. The student then has the opportunity to appeal the decision by presenting a written statement to the dean of the college. All conversations and material regarding cases on academic responsibility will remain confidential. the proceedings of the case are filed at the registrar's office separate from the student's academic record.

Sununu will speak at Weis Center

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

John Sununu, former White House Chief of Staff and current co-host of CNN's "Crossfire," will give the annual O.V.W. Hawkins Lecture at Bucknell University Sunday, Oct. 18, at 7:30 p.m. in the Weis Center.

Keith Buffinton, assistant professor of mechanical engineering, anticipates that turnout for the lecture, entitled "The Role of Engineers and Scientists in Politics and Government," will be approximately 400–600 people and will include a large number of people from the local community.

"We hope he will relate his experiences in engineering and politics and will discuss why he chose in mid-career to go into politics," said Buffinton. "Up until that point he had done all the standard academic things."

Buffinton said that as issues involving technology have become increasingly important, it has become essential that people with technical backgrounds get more involved in politics.

"Sununu should address the idea that not only engineers, but students in the arts and sciences and the public in general as well, need to know more about technology in order to contribute to society," said Buffinton.

The recipient of degrees from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, including a doctorate in mechanical engineering, Sununu was associate dean of the College of Engineering at Tufts University where he also served as associate professor of mechanical engineering.

College Democrats, Republicans organize pre-election activities

BY BRIAN ENG AND DEB MANASSE

As election day approaches, political activity has intensified around campus. The Bucknell chapters of College Democrats and College Republicans are playing a major role in election-centered programming.

Brian Sipes–The Bucknellian
Jeff Dinard '93, president of the College Republicans characterized the group as "championing the more conservative views."

According to Jeffrey Dinard '93, president of College Republicans, the group has participated in several projects which include a trip to Penn State University where they saw President Bush, and a Fundraising Brunch for local Congressman Russ Fairchild.

They have also campaigned on campus, hanging posters and handing out bumper stickers and pins to members of the University community.

"It's been an incredibly active semester," said Dinard. "We are hoping to set up a faculty debate to discuss issues of the campaign."

In addition, the newly formed College Democrats sponsored a voter registration drive on campus.

The group has also canvassed Lewisburg through phone calls and is currently working on having candidates come to talk on campus.

Although ideologies differ between the two groups, both stress the importance of participation in the election and are disturbed by what they see as a feeling of apathy among college-age voters. The short-term goals of both organizations include educating people on the issues and getting them interested in the political process. "It really is to their benefit to get involved," said Malague. "It is also important for people to remember that politics don't stop in November; there are always issues to be dealt with."

Katie Malague '94 president of the College Democrats, said the group is "hard to categorize, open to a variety of views and not rigid."

mencement. Marsh responded to criticisms of the proposed schedule by stressing that the motion reflected the committee's attempt to best resolve the conflicting needs and desires of various groups within the University community.

"This is a compromise between student preference to move [the start of the spring semester] back and faculty preference, even requirement, to have that time to prepare to teach," said Marsh.

Additional changes to the calendar include semesters which begin on Wednesday and end on Tuesday and an altered reading period and finals schedule.

During discussion of the revised finals schedule, several members of the faculty questioned why finals are scheduled on Saturday but not Sunday, indicating that this practice is insensitive to Jewish students.

Following a motion by Gregory Krohn, associate professor of economics, to adjust the final exam schedule to avoid Saturday exams, the re-calendaring proposal was modified such that the Wednesday following the last day of class will be a day of reading period. Finals will then run from Thursday to Thursday with no exams on Saturday or Sunday.

Commoner speaks on need for environmental focus

BY CARRIE WULLEN

Barry Commoner, one of today's most prominent environmental thinkers, spoke to Bucknellians last night and stressed the relationship between the economy and the environment. Barry Commoner is the author of The Closing Circle, Poverty of Power, and Making Peace with the Planet. His was the latest in a series of presentations given as a part of the President's Forum "The Environmental Imperative."

His lecture illustrated the importance of President Sojka's plea for creative environmental problem-solving on campus.

Commoner urged his audience to devise new strategies to significantly improve the quality of the environment. He emphasized the interdependency of economic and environmental conditions and said, "The only way we're going to improve the environment is if we rebuild the economy." He also recognized that both environmental justice and economic justice are necessary in creating the atmosphere for change.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Commoner stressed the interdependencies between environmental and economic concerns.

Commoner cited the key to effective change as social intervention, saying that if people work together to demand greener systems of production, industries will be forced to respond. According to Commoner, the result would be massive changes in the modes of production and the kinds of goods produced, a process which will ultimately benefit both the consumer and the producer.

Commoner suggested that the American people are convinced that the environment must be protected, but this will remain an impossibility unless we insist on progressive economic reforms. He and President Sojka agreed that our goal must be sustainable growth and development. To achieve sustainability, economic, political, social, and environmental policies must be in accordance with one another. According to Commoner, the reversal of the destruction of our planet will require intensive structural change; we can no longer afford to make compromises.

work. He claimed that pollution control devices are the source of conflict between the economy and the environment.

Commoner argued that control devices create an economic problem not only because of the costs of using them, but also because of the fact that they do not produce anything and therefore take money away from other, more productive uses in our society. According to Commoner, control and regulation of pollution are not going to work because pollution is what he calls "an incurable disease," and thus the best way to protect the environment is through a strategy of prevention.

> "This kind of an effort has both economic impact and leadership potential for Bucknell."
> — Mary Evelyn Tucker, associate professor of religion

Stating that "pollution prevention means going back to the origin of the pollutant which is in the system of production," Commoner concluded that we must change the systems of production in order to solve the environmental problems. He called for massive changes in our transportation, energy, and agriculture systems, stressing the need for a "renaissance in our entire economy...for the sake of improving our environment."

Commoner claimed that the technologies needed to make such changes already exist. He cited the examples of photovoltaic cells, which rely on solar energy, and electric cars. These technological improvements would help prevent environmental damage because they would not produce pollutants.

Calling for people to respond to "the opportunity to solve environmental and economic problems together," Commoner advocated the adoption of a national industrial policy. He also noted, "the way in which we have made the changes [in our environmental strategy] is called popular environmental democracy."

In terms of Bucknell's future relationship with the environment, Commoner suggested that the University could investigate the use of photovoltaic cells for parking lot lights. Sojka stated that he believed a policy of moving towards living in harmony with the environment could even lead to economic savings.

Sojka acknowledged that the environmental task force and the move towards sustainable growth for Bucknell will probably go too far for some people and not far enough for others.

Yet he stated that as long as the public understands the issues involved and is willing to be a part of the solution, a policy of sustainable growth in the quality of Bucknell's programs through harmony with our environment is crucial.

Anyone interested in being a part of the task force should contact Professor Tucker or President Sojka for more information.

Committee reviews trustee directives

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The TIP (Trustee Implementation Planning) Progress Report Committee is currently reviewing the effectiveness of a set of reconstructive directives that were initiated by the Board of Trustees.

The directives were formulated in 1991 in response to a concern among the Trustees and members of the Bucknell Community that the social and residential environment on campus interferes with the achievement of the University's stated mission.

"Bucknell expects its students to be concerned with two closely related types of development," the Mission Statement reads, "that of the productive citizen and that of the person working toward intellectual maturity and self-awareness." Community members felt that the student social environment needed to be changed in order to fully achieve this mission.

The Board of Trustees, based on President Gary Sojka's draft of nine principles and seventeen directives of the University, approved a series of recommendations that aimed to improve the campus social environment. In the spring of 1991, the Trustees assigned six "Trustee Implementation Planning" (TIP) groups to help activate their recommendations.

The groups were assigned to the areas of Greek life, residential life, social changes, first-year experiences, four-year residency requirement, and the annual report to the Trustees. TIP group reports wei put into effect in the fall of 1991.

The review committee is currently evaluating the progress of the groups' recommendations.

The committee has been charged with "looking at the directives and commenting on our institutional progress toward meeting those directives," said Nancy Weyant, Coordinator of Reference Desk Services and co-chair of the committee. "We are looking at where we were, where we are now, and whether or not we are progressing toward that goal at a purposeful speed."

Brian Sipes— The Bucknellian
Trevor Wilson '93, co-chair of TIP Progress Report Committee stressed the need to create a balance between students' social and academic lives.

Committee co-chair Trevor Wilson '93 points out that the TIP proposal is not just a response to the Greek system but to the entire social atmosphere on campus. He and Weyant believe that there should be an "area of overlap" between the social and academic lives of students. The directives are an attempt to recognize that the social and the academic should not be mutually exclusive worlds.

Ten of the seventeen directives that the committee is evaluating deal with aspects of Greek life. The trend is to develop a social atmosphere that is not dominated by fraternities and sororities.

Wilson said that the Trustees "didn't want the students to feel that they had to be Greek on this campus. They were saying that being non-Greek is all right, too."

To help generate that feeling, Trustees proposed directives that attempt to incorporate first-year students and independent students more actively into the social atmosphere.

For example, one recommendation is to "develop a larger inventory of social spaces that can be programmed by students and student groups."

Part of the committee's responsibility is to examine whether or not the social climate now is more structured around students outside the Greek system than it was before the TIP recommendations were implemented.

The Greek situation before the TIP proposals was unstable. Faculty voted to abolish the Greek system in the spring of 1990 and sever the University's relations with fraternities and sororities.

Before the motion was even brought to the floor, however, alumni, Trustees, and parents of both current and past students voiced their opinion in favor of keeping the Greek system on campus.

Instead of removing the system, the Trustees acknowledged the flaws in the Greek policies and issued mandates to improve the situation. The TIP proposal is a part of these improvements.

The committee to review the TIP proposals was coordinated by Barbara Shailor, Vice- President for Student Services, during the summer. Weyant feels that factions of all University groups are represented on the committee.

There is at least one representative from each of the three upper classes, a balance of men and women, Greek and non-Greek members, and administration and faculty.

Weyant and Wilson divided the fifteen-member group into four subcommittees, two for Greek-based policy and directives and two for campus-based policy and directives. The committee as a whole will not do the actual altering of the directives but they may suggest to redefine or amend the present status of the recommendations.

The committee will present their findings to the Board of Trustees on Friday, November 13.

Professor addresses women's increasing role in political issues

BY CHRISTINA TISA AND ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Women's issues have been gaining ascendance in electoral politics since the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings which occurred one year ago, said Patricia Misciagno, associate professor of political science. Misciagno who teaches a class called "The American Presidency" and "Women in Politics," said that the treatment of Anita Hill raised several questions about women's issues and politics, the most important being representation since all of the 14 members of the Senate Judiciary Committee which cross-examined Hill, were male.

The issue of representation is clearly observable in this election, said Misciagno. She cited Lynn Yeakel, who is running against incumbent Pennsylvania Senator Arlen Specter, one of the more outspoken members of the Judiciary Committee, as a prime example of the increasing role of women in political campaigns. Carol Mosley Braun who is running for office in Illinois, and Barbara Boxer and Diane Feinstein who are both seeking office in California are putting women's electoral concerns into the forefront at the local level.

Misciagno said that she saw a clear contrast between the two major party's Presidential candidates, George Bush and Bill Clinton. She also said thatClinton's record of appointing a large number of women to policy making positions in Arkansas, almost 50% of his administration, was a good indicator that he would be a positive force for women's issues, as well as health care, and a pro-choice agenda. Bush, said Misciagno has not been a positive force in women's issues. She cited Bush's veto of the family leave bill as well as legislation that would have helped women to sue in the workplace, and his appointment record as areas of concern.

In addition to the issues raised by specific races, Misciagno said that there is a general trend of increased participation by women in the political process. According to Misciagno, more women are aware of political issues, and are working positively to change "the exclusive system." Furthermore, women are showing increased support for female candidates not only by their votes but by campaign contributions as well, according to Misciagno.

Some of the long term goals that women's issues are concerned with, said Misciagno, are equity in the workplace, increased intolerance of sexual harassment, and increased awareness by all members of society.

Fellowships offered to minority engineers

The National Consortium for Graduate Degrees for Minorities in Engineering and Science, Inc. (GEM) will award 300 new fellowships in 1993 to minority students for graduate study leading to a master's or doctorate degree.

GEM, a non-profit, tax-exempt corporation based at the University of Notre Dame, provides graduate study opportunities for underrepresented minority students at the master's and doctoral levels in engineering and the natural sciences through a program of paid summer internships and financial assistance.

Applicants must be an American citizen and a member of one of the following ethnic minority groups: American Indian, Black American, Mexican American, or Puerto Rican. Currently, one out of seven full-time minority engineering students are GEM fellows.

Greeks threatened

In order to keep Lehigh University's Greek system intact, Lehigh President Peter Likins said, significant changes must be seen in areas such as financial management and pledge development.

Fraternities and sororities held an All-Greek Day to inform the community of its policies. Topics discussed included financial management, risk management, social programming in the new BYOB environment, men's fraternity rush convocation, rush planning, standards and pride, house management, pledging and membership development and alumni relations.

Likins expects cooperation among Greeks, the administration and alumnl of the Greek system to be the key to the system's survival.

Textbook prices soar?

High textbook prices are an annual nuisance to many college students. But instead of the seemingly constant price increase, Barry Noel, Gettysburg College's bookstore manager, said that a book price increase has occurred only once in the past five years.

Universities argue that they cannot control publishing or printing costs, or the price of shipping and handling. High textbook prices are the inevitable result.

A weekly newsletter published by the National Association of College Stores reported that from 1982 to 1992, textbook prices have risen by 104 percent. A spokesman for Wm. C. Brown Communications, however, pointed out that the average price increase in May, 1992 was under one percent, which is lower than the increases of previous years and even lower than inflation.

BYOB at Lehigh

Lehigh University has recently installed its BYOB policy for campus fraternity parties. The policy has recieved mixed reactions because many people are concerned that the new policy will create new problems as it solves old ones. Proponents argue that the new social policy is positive in that it removes liability from the fraternity houses. If an underage drinker is found intoxicated, the policy reads that the house is no longer held responsible.

Under the BYOB policy, a person of legal age can bring up to 12 cans of beer in the day or six cans of beer in the night to a fraternity holding a registered party. The individual would be given a card indicating the brand and amount of beer as well as the fraternity and the date of the party.

Bucknell alumna returns to design costumes for upcoming show

Eileen Marks Lloyd '88 works on her costume design for Mrs. Baker, the owner of the hotel in the department of theatre and dance's production of The Sular Life of Albert Nobbs.

It's like the kind of story you read about — determined young student pursues an education in the arts against her parents' dreams of her becoming a doctor. She is seduced into the life of the theater, graduates a theater major, and returns to her alma mater four years later as a successful costume designer.

But for Eileen Marks Lloyd '88, it's more than a story. It's a biography. Lloyd returns to campus this season as the costume designer for The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs.

Having attended the National High School Institute at Northwestern before coming to Bucknell, Lloyd was unphased by her parents' wish that she study medicine.

"I wanted desperately to be in the theater. It (her parents' wish) didn't deter me at all," Lloyd said.

Lloyd initially wanted to attend a conservatory after high school, but she compromised with her parents and decided instead to attend a liberal arts school. Lloyd agreed to visit Bucknell, her mother's alma mater, and the rest, as they say, is history.

"I thought it was the most incredibly beautiful campus I'd seen," Lloyd said.

As a freshman interested in the stage, Lloyd was immediately drawn into the department of theatre and dance. Within the first three weeks of her freshman year, Lloyd was in the costume shop at work on Scapino!.

"One I was in, I never left... I had the opportunity to do anything," Lloyd said. She worked on every production the department sponsored during her four years as an undergraduate, either as an actress or as a member of the production team.

Additionally, Lloyd was an active member of Cap and Dagger, holding an executive position for three years. Lloyd was instrumental to the growth of the student theater society, and helped to redraft the constitution under which Cap and Dagger now operates.

But the main attraction that drew Lloyd to the department was the faculty. Working under Professor Harvey Powers, Lloyd witnessed the dedication of Tustin Theater to Powers at the opening of Bacchae, the theater's baptismal show.

Lloyd later worked under Powers as an actress in Crimes of the Heart. The experience, she claims, was incredible.

"He (Powers) did more to keep me here than anything else... He lit fires under people."

Lloyd credits Elaine Williams, professor of theatre and dance, however, as setting her on the design path. After taking several theater courses, Williams, recognizing Lloyd's flair for costume design, pulled her into the technical side of the department.

"I stayed in theater because of Harvey. I got into costumes because of Elaine," said Lloyd.

Receiving an MFA in costume design from the University of Illinois, Lloyd moved on to the world of professional theater. Since then she has compiled an impressive resume.

Lloyd has worked extensively in the Krannert Center for Performing Arts, the main theatrical building for the University of Illinois. The Krannert Center was designed by the architect who designed the Metropolitan Opera House in New York City, and is considered to be one of the top theatrical centers in the Midwest.

Additionally, Lloyd has worked with the Utah Shakespearean Festival and the Virginia Shakespeare Festival. Her talents range from millinery and draping to dying and fine needlework.

Lloyd starts most of her costume designs on the basis of color. For The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs, a play about two Victorian women who dress as men in order to get better jobs, Lloyd's costume designs are based on a black and white scheme to denote the stark difference between women and men.

The play will be performed October 23–25, and October 30–November 1. Tickets are $5 ($3 with BUID) and available at the Langone Center Box Office. Come opening night, the campus will be able to view for themselves the obvious talent of their returning alumna.

Movie Review

Not worth your Saturday night

BY VALERIE K. MARSDEN

Billy Crystal spent the bulk of his career working on Mr. Saturday Night. The movie presents the culmination of an eight year project that was born in 1984 on the set of HBO's A Comic's Line and NBC's Saturday Night Live. It proves to be a waste of time for Crystal, who spends two hours on the screen drowning in matzoh ball soup and out dated one-liners.

Crystal plays Buddy Young, Jr, an aged, past-his-prime comedian who spends two hours trying to make it to the fame he never achieved. Through flashbacks, we realize the reason Buddy never made it to glory is his egotistical and obnoxious personality. Throughout his life Young degrades his agent and brother Stan (David Paymer), neglects his wife (Julie Warner), and destroys his career by not being able to keep his big mouth shut.

Entertainment Weekly hailed the film as, "very winning," and Premiere likewise raved, "Mahvelous! Watch for a nomination... right here!" So what was it about Mr. Saturday Night that didn't hold the college-aged viewer?

Crystal both produced and directed Mr. Saturday Night, resulting in two hours of Crystal humoring himself, while completely ignoring his other actors. Every part in the film, every character, was underdeveloped, with the notable exception of Stan. Paymer surprisingly pulls off a wonderful performance admist all the schlock.

When one sees a film, that contains flashbacks of a person's younger former heyday, one would expect the film to be set within that flashback period. Yet Crystal focuses on his aged, poorly latexed, miserable, whining self instead of concentrating on what could have been an interesting younger character.

The makeup jobs lacked reality—suicidal in a film about a group of senior citizens played by a group of middle-aged actors. Julie Warner, who plays Crystal's backstage wife, was so poorly made up, you could see where her extra chin was glued on when she smiled. It looked like an inner tube around her neck.

With flashbacks that resembled the present more than scenes that were actually supposed to be the present, the plot remained unconvincing. Since I didn't believe the present, due to the sloppy make up jobs and poor acting (the actors spoke and moved the same at 70 as they did at 17) how can I believe the past?

Also lacking was the comedic element an audience expects from a film written by a legendary comic like Crystal. Mr. Saturday Night was supposed to be a film of wonderful one-liners, but many were repetitive, poorly written, and, not surprisingly, only one remains memorable.

"A man walks into a doctor's office and says, 'Doctor, I have five penises.' The doctor says, 'Five penises, how do your pants fit?' 'Like a glove.'" Ba dum dum.

This is a film that would appeal to an older generation. What failed for me, as a college student would probably have my parents rolling in the aisles.

The bulk of Young's material centers on the predictable, slapstick comedy of the 40's and 50's. When Young hits the height of his career, Sid Caesar is king on television, Jack Benny is still at his prime and Jerry Lewis is the man Young aspires to be like.

Had I not been with two friends, I would have gladly left he theater and viewed the last fifteen minutes of The Last of the Mohicans next door. The most enjoyment we got out of the film was making fun of it afterwards.

Taking a coffee break

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It's 9 p.m. Wednesday night. You're fed up with calculus, and you're not looking forward to the four-hour geology lab that looms in the not-so-distant future. You want food. You want coffee. You want to be entertained.

What do you do?

"You go to the Coffeehouse," Says Brian King '95, who, with Jenny Markewich '95, coordinates the Wednesday night ritual that takes place from 9-11 p.m. in the Bison.

"Coffeehouse is a good break from studies in a stress-free atmosphere," said Markewich.

Sponsored by the Bison Programming Committee, which also provides free coffee and cookies for students, the Coffeehouse began two years ago in an effort to provide student performers with a chance to perform.

Student performers are paid $60 an hour to do a Coffeehouse program. Many Bucknell students, like Joel Wainwright '95, Jeff Wescott '95, Noah Jenkins '95, and Amanda Swarr '95, otherwise known collectively as "Bunch O' Freaks," perform repeatedly at the Coffeehouses.

The origin of their band's name is an interesting one. "Noah turned to me at a FLAG and B (Friends of Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals) meeting and said, 'Are we going to come up with a name, or just go out there a bunch of freaks?' " Wainwright said. Jenkins claims the name is, "subject to change."

Swarr stated that one of the reasons she enjoys performing at Coffeehouse with "Bunch O' Freaks" is that they can donate their earnings to FLAG and B. The other members of the band readily agreed.

As coordinators of the Coffeehouses, King and Markewich are always on the lookout for students to provide talent for the celebrated Wednesday night music fest.

"If anyone is interested in performing or just helping out with the coffeehouse, they should contact us," King said. "Coffeehouse is filled with lots of neat surprises, a plethora of crayons, candles— all kinds of stuff."

Call Brian King at x4783 or Jenny Markewich at x4755 for more information about Coffeehouse.

Stop following footsteps of other schools

The need to compete in this financially centered day and age is obvious. So is the need, however, to remain individualistic and unique. Why then does Bucknell insist, time and time again, decision after decision, to follow in the footsteps of its frame-of-reference schools?

Soon Colgate, Lehigh, Lafayette, and Bucknell might as well become branch campuses of Beautifulsmallprivate U. The only decision prospective students will have to make is one regarding the locale. Do they prefer an old steel town or one that is still alive? The mountains of Pennsylvania or New York?

First, the faculty killed our Jan-Plan, one of the last programs on campus to set us apart from our infamous frame-of-reference schools. Besides slightly low student involvement in the program, the faculty sighted our late May/early June dismissal as a problem. Other schools, those without an interim program, got out earlier and their students received a jump on obtaining summer jobs.

Will the week or two that we will gain really give us that much of an advantage in the summer job search? Or are students just going to become bored at home over the long Christmas break and be denied the always educational (in some way) benefit of research, travel, or winter employment?

While revising the calendar year, the faculty next decided to tack on an extra five and a half school days. They rationalized that it put Bucknell closer to the calendar of its frame-of-reference schools.

It's ironic that an institution of higher learning of all places, a place that teaches the importance of thinking as an individual, would feel such a great need to assimilate, to be like everyone else. The copying of others' ideas is usually forbidden at academic institutions. Yet, Bucknell has blatantly looked over the shoulder of other universities and plagiarized them. Credit has been given where credit is due, but any good English professor would call the original and secondary user the same.

To help "fit" these extra "academic" days into the new calendar, the faculty decided to cut a day off of the reading period each semester. So, they essentially have increased the number of potential work days while cutting the number of study days. How academically oriented is that?

If the faculty insists upon following in the footsteps of frame of reference schools, then couldn't they at least have aimed for the level of the academically elite Ivies, whose reading periods extend for a week or more? Why lower our standards just to comply to the level of other schools, many of whom are already considerably below Bucknell in admission and teaching standards.

Smart decisions have been made before. The restructuring of our social/residential system stands out as an example for other schools to examine. Our rather successful plan came about by evaluating other school's plans and then creating a model custom designed for us.

Why should the faculty start to falter now? Just remember that the list of schools similar to us are, after all, frame of reference schools, and not a standard by which to measure ourselves and imitate.

Alumna praises students for "de rigueur" friendliness

TO THE EDITOR:

After returning home from a rainy weekend at Bucknell Homecoming, I am compelled to write a brief note of praise to the student body. We are always so quick to criticize it seems, that I wanted to be equally quick in rendering praise where praise is due.

I certainly fall, I fear, within that group of aging alumni that come back to campus repeatedly after graduation and which we, as students in 1960-64, observed and frequently shared our private comments about. Nevertheless, I am now there and fully realize what Bucknell meant to my predecessors then, and means to me now.

It was a real pleasure for my wife and I to be consistently greeted warmly by students. A friendly greeting was "de rigueur" and encountered at any hour and any place, even late at night in a social situation. Certainly that should be the norm in any situation, but it isn't, and the fact that it happens naturally at Bucknell makes my praise and support for the institution even stronger.

Students purchase 30% of the Weis Center tickets

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to take a few lines to acknowledge the more than 30 brothers of Delta Upsilon Fraternity who purchased tickets and attended the Weis Center Series concert by Double Edge last Friday evening. A gesture of this kind should not go unheralded for a number of reasons, the most important to me being that it belies such generalized criticisms as there is nothing to do around here, Bucknell students (and Greeks in particular) are more interested in partying than their education, or that young adults are less and less concerned with culture and the arts.

More than 30 per cent of annual attendees at Weis Center Events are Bucknell students, a statistic that seems to be not very obvious to many members of the campus community. This is one of the highest percentages of student participation recorded by arts venues affiliated with institutions of higher education in the United States, but there is no reason why it should not be higher, and one of the most effective forms of encouragement can be the model provided by fellow students, faculty, and staff. And so I applaud these gentlemen and hope their colleagues and peers profit from their example.

Good luck man, John, explains his purpose

TO THE EDITOR:

John stands where he stands to pray for money for a Christian ministry for Jewish people that he has worked with for several years to put together.

He has started to say "good luck" (he says "in the savior's name" to himself) so that the students can possibly have a positive blessing in their day.

John believes that the students at Bucknell are among the finest of the young people on the earth.

His prayer for them is that everyone of them find three who like them and who can bless them in every way.

John is an organist and is greatly interested in the work of religion.

John appreciates and acknowledges in a word of "thanks" for all the students and people at Bucknell who are kind to him and who make beginning a new, blessed ministry for the creator, the savior and the holy spirit easier.

Are gays safe on campus?

TO THE EDITOR:

Two weeks ago, Brian McNaught came to speak at Bucknell about homophobia and heterosexism; his lecture, entitled "On Being Gay in a Straight World", was a powerful exposure to the experiences of a gay man struggling to find an identity in an oppressive society. Unfortunately, Bucknell reflects those homophobic aspects of our society, although too often we choose to ignore the suffering.

A few hours before attending the lecture, I put up a sign on a door in Smith 1D advertising the event. Within six hours, the sign was defaced. Where it once read, "On Being Gay in a Straight World", it was changed to, "On Beating Gays..." We need to understand that this represents an attack on homosexual people in the Bucknell community; any lesbian, gay, or bisexual student who read that sign knows that s/he is not safe. Considering that a minimum of 10% of Bucknellians are gay or lesbian (with an additional 20-25% bisexual), we must acknowledge the impact of these hateful, criminal words.

Prompt action was taken to formally report the incident. For reference, there are always several options open to people who are threatened by homophobia or heterosexism; if you are threatened by such remarks or actions, contact one of the following for information on your options: Matthew Frericks, Cindy Peltier, Peter Hovmand, Amanda Swarr, or Joel Wainwright.

Man, animals, including pigeons, vital to ecosytem

TO THE EDITOR:

This letter is in response to the Misses Stevenson and Marshall, who so fervently espouse the radical view that animals have rights. They do not have any innate rights; the only rights they have are those which we humans wish to accord them. Yet they are not even worthy of those, for along with a right comes the responsibility of standing up for the rights of your brethren; I have yet to observe safari footage of a lion standing up for the right of a water buffalo to remain uneaten. The animal rights radicals are just another sign, along with the Jack Kavorkians and Hemlock Societies, of the dramatic devaluation of human life that is occurring in our society today. Of course we don't round up the homeless and shoot them; they are infinitely more valuable than the most magnificent beast, despite the pathetic scientists like Jane Goodall who have claimed that the most brilliant ape is comparable to the most retarded, vegetative human.

I'm sorry that these ladies have fallen prey to the myth that man is an impostor on this tiny, fragile planet. Man is as much a part of the food chain as any other life form; he is the predator of animals, such as pigeons, that have no other natural enemies. Nature is not as delicate and loving as you think, for those animals whose growth is not checked by man suffer death by starvation, disease, and other unpleasant means. Earth is not as delicately and precipitously situated as you clamor, for whole species of animals have come and gone, oceans have risen and fallen, meteors have caused global disasters; life still thrives. Go ahead and recycle paper clips; I shall continue to exercise my God-given right to slaughter any non-human creature I deem necessary, keeping at bay the infestation of animal righters and granolas that has besieged our poor, beleaguered nation.

Marc Haimes' The point

Dean Commerford accepts Haimes' challenge, showers in Kress for week

The place: Kress Hall—a darkened room 228. The date: Saturday, September 26. Time like a tell-tale heart ticked out 7:33 am— a full 3 and a half hours before any scheduled awakage possibilities. Something was very, very wrong. Bit by bit, inch by inch I shifted my pillow-cased head, squinting for the danger. And sure enough, right there, completely eclipsing the light of the doorway, a misty figure cleared its throat and bellowed my name."Marc Haimes? Are you, Marc Haimes?"

It's Satan! I immediately thought. He found out about the kitten experiments. He's going to drag me away to the Pits Of Usher!

The raven-black shadow, the looming beast, the Prince of Darkness spoke once more. "I'm Dean Commerford. I just dropped by to store my soap and towel."

Good, God! I italicized. He's actually going to go through with it!

My shock came as no great surprise. Yes, I had recently written a most courteous column, respectfully asserting that Dean Commerford might find the Kress showers a trifle mercurial in temperament. Within the same article, I politely urged the Dean to engage in daily Kress showers for one week, alluding to the idea that he might not find this experience exceptionally pleasant. But! I repeat with a giant, BUT! I never expected him to actually take me up on my offer. In fact, my Senior-year assessment of the Bucknell hierarchy was that they had roughly the same amount of compassion as rotted bread crust— and only a few more brain cells. However, Dean Commerford was truly an impeccable sport, not to mention a classy act. Starting that day, he showered at Kress Hall five times, demonstrating an enormous amount of sympathy, concern, and compassion which far exceeded my moldy expectations.

And yet, our initial conversation probably could have gone a little better. Still blanketed by the belligerence of dawn deprivation, my response to the Dean's assertion that his morning bathing had been uneventful was a tad hostile. "Of course it was uneventful! The only people awake right now are currently puking into their aspirin bottles." No, no, I'm just kidding. I would never say something like that to a dean. "The only people awake right nowarecurrently ...uh... engaged in reverse paristaltic maneuvers," was what I really said. Still, the Dean maintained his enormous amount of aplomb, declaring that he would be delighted to bathe at even the most congested hours. So, in response, I jotted down a "Marc Haimes' Shower Schedule" of maximum morning cloggage. Then, I couldn't resist asking him one final question. "What did you think of the article?" I asked innocently.

> Not only did Commerford frequent the Kress showers every morning, but he also kept a complete journal of his bathing endeavors. In his shower log the dean kept tabs on temperature continuity and overall bathroom cleanliness. "No crud on walls or floor," he notes on day one.

"I liked it," he responded. "It was cute."

I swear to God that's what he said.

And so the showering began. My hallmates were overwhelmingly impressed with Commerford's actions. "Give the guy credit. He sure has big [guts] to come here and do this," one of them commented.

"Yeah," another agreed. "Let's steal his clothes and leave a pink, frilly bathrobe and take a picture when he walks down the hall."

I debated the idea for a Kodak moment. It would have made a nice visual aid for the column. However, I decided to nix the suggestion after considering the following academic proverb: one who pushes the dean of residential life too far, ends up living the remainder of his senior year in a tent on the academic quad. Also, no one could deny that Commerford had definitely risen above and beyond the call of duty. And we respected him for it.

Not only did Commerford frequent the Kress showers every morning, but he also kept a complete journal of his bathing endeavors. In his shower log the dean kept tabs on temperature continuity and overall bathroom cleanliness. "No crud on walls or floor," he notes on day one. And, when he first experienced the trauma of scalding nozzle fluctuation, the dean was quick to put it writing. "Ouch!" he eloquently expressed, "I finally got hit with a surge of hot water." Our esteemed shower auditor was also quick to lend a helping hand. "Shower head pulled off," he wrote. "I play[ed] plumber and fix[ed].

At the conclusion of the week, Commerford deduced that there was a slight problem and acted accordingly. In a memo to the physical plant (sent along with his two-page journal) he acknowledges that "there is nothing practical that can be done to correct the surge of hot water in the shower when someone flushes a toilet. We have all experienced this in our own homes." However, he does request that the more easily assuagable cold-water blasts be fixed. In addition, the Dean penned a letter to all Kress resident assistants describing the occasional blasts of cold water he noticed in his "on site, in shower study of the showers." "Please let me know a.s.a.p. if this is a problem on your floor so we can move forward to possibly correct this problem," he urges them.

So, in conclusion, Dean Commerford proved himself a most worthy administrator and a fine human being. Only the most dedicated worker would take the time to respond so personally and diligently to a student's concern. And while my future showers may not be perfect, I realize that this variance is by no means malicious or thoroughly evil. Perhaps nothing is thoroughly evil— even Bucknell administrators.

Is this the wrong moment to bring up the fact that the laundry room is still void of dispensers?

OPINIONS

FROM THE TRENCHES

A FOURTH YEAR PERSPECTIVE

By Andrew Cohen

Student fullfills dream, learns truth about student-athletes

I always hated what I could not be. First and foremost, I hated jocks. The athletic splendor of my junior high school days had long since passed me by. There was a time when my name instilled fear in the hearts of twelve year old baseball pitchers. Eight years later, twenty pounds overweight with the speed of a tortoise and half its lung capacity, I wondered where it all had gone, and I knew, I hated those god-damned jocks.

The jocks here are stupid, I thought. They did not have the academic requirements to get into Bucknell, but the admissions office in their ongoing conspiracy against the intelligentsia accepted these jocks for their barbaric "skills" said I, armchair judge, jury and executioner. I had heard of Bucknell's Academic All-Americans, which I took to be some kind of inside job perpetrated by the jocks so they did not seem dumb to the outside world. One of my favorite expressions was that the "football team could use a little more time in the weight room and less time in the barroom." It was advice I would have done well to have heeded.

And yet, every so often there was a thought from which I had no hope of escape. Sitting in bed after a night of gluttonous unhealthy activity, I planned my comeback. The very next day I would begin a rigorous training program which would culminate in my return and ascendance in the game for whom my love was pure, almost angelic. I saw myself nailing fastballs, waiting on the change, staying down on the curve. The vision was so clear I could hardly be mistaken. But the next day these wildly fanatical delusions were dashed as my normal laziness overtook me. My baseball career could obviously wait as I continued to look down my nose at the jocks.

I do not know what made me do it. Maybe it was the lack of chemical toxins affecting my judgement. I was going to be a senior in the fall, maybe I did it because I knew it was my last shot. And maybe, it was the fact that I lost something when I walked off the field four years ago. My life got very serious about the time I stopped playing; it did not have to, I just decided that it was time to "grow up." The bliss of youth became a foreigner whose shadow I could sometimes catch a glimpse of over the horizon. Whatever the reason was, I had decided, the comeback had come back.

On July 17 I ran for the first time in a long time. The mile long route was grueling and exhilarating. With every step demons with names like "could've, should've, and would've" were exorcised. I continued and expanded upon my program doing little else in a day's time. After a week I saw no improvement in my physique, but I trudged on, my spirit had grown by leaps and bounds. My training got easier and easier. Every time I got tired I merely imagined myself playing baseball; the power the thought had over my body was god-like.

By the middle of August I was ready to try. At a batting cage somewhere in the middle of New Jersey I found myself putting on the mittens I was using for batting gloves, slipping on a helmet, picking up my club-like weapon and bearing down against my foe. I bunted the first pitch in order to time the pitches, and then I picked up where I had left off so long ago. I was hammering my opponent unmercifully, I knew I still had it. Finally, my adversary was worn down and yielded as the time on my tokens ran out.

I am only half aware of what happened next. I turned around shaking violently with a stupid grin on my face. I was disoriented but I somehow got myself out of the batting cage when I realized that I had no feeling below my knees. The bliss of youth had returned, unbridled and overwhelming.

I redoubled my already rigorous training schedule so that I would be ready to tryout for the Bucknell baseball team in the fall. I came up to school early so that I could practice catching, throwing, and running on the bases. Sure my arm was like jello every night, but that only added to the excitement of engaging in a physical challenge.

I talked with Coach Depew, told him that I was a senior who had played some ball during the summer and wanted to try out for the team. He told me that I had all fall for open tryouts, that he thought I would find it quite competitive, and he looked forward to seeing me come out. Essentially he was being honest, really saying, "You probably don't have a shot, but come out and have fun." I appreciated it.

I went to the baseball meetings, got my physical and first clean bill of health in years, and prepared for the first day of tryouts. I felt intimidated at the meetings. I knew couple of the upperclassmen who had seen me at my weakest and probably could not figure out what I was doing at their meeting. The first year students who were trying out made me feel silly and immature since I was a senior and occasionally had to explain what the hell I was doing there.

> I also discovered something about my hatred of jocks. My modicum of experience endowed me with respect and admiration for the accomplishments of athletes on the field. But for those athletes who are successful students, those students-athletes, I say to you, never let anyone call you a "jock."

I planned ahead to get a good night sleep so I would be ready for the first day of tryouts. It rained, and deep down I was relieved, I was petrified, not at the prospect of not being good enough, but at the fact that I might be the worst one there by far.

I was more or less ready to play by the day tryouts really began with the exception of a pulled hamstring which prevented me from sprinting. That the first thing we had to do was get timed in the 60 yard dash was not the cheeriest of signs. Not wanting to seem like the wuss I had been in the past, I kept my mouth shut and ran. Normally I was slow, now I was slower than slow. But there was more baseball to be played so I kept my spirits up.

It was a grueling first week. It was also my last week. The ominous signs kept piling up. My catcher's mitt broke the first day so I decided to tryout for another of my old positions, pitcher. After two days of throwing, I could barely toss the ball, let alone pitch. My hamstring was getting better when suddenly more sprints were announced. All in all I was clearly overmatched on the field. This was serious business.

But strangely enough, it was not entirely my physical performance that made me decide to leave. I found that the extra time and energy spent on baseball threw my academics into chaos. Watching television was disastrous, let alone an afternoon nap. How could I go without these staples of my existence. Unprepared, I did not budget my time as all student-athletes must. Falling behind in school already, I phoned the coach's office and left a message saying that I would be unable to make practice because I had too much homework. The next day, Coach Depew told me I had to take my commitment seriously and learn how to budget my time so I could make practice. I wanted to give him a tongue-lashing about the importance of my almighty GPA, about the time demands of my senior thesis and calculus class, but instead I sat and ruminated over his words. He was right. Being a student-athlete takes a type of discipline I can now understand, but still can not exhibit.

Later that day I talked to the coach and let him know about my early retirement. I do not think it was all that unexpected. The coach left me with a few words that I shall not soon forget, "You know you tried. Now, you'll never look back and say what would have happened if..."

Coach Depew's words helped me to take more off that field than a battered body and ego. All my life had been about winning. Ironically, a competitive sport taught me that there are some things in which making the effort is enough to claim a spiritual victory. I had done what I always dreamed of. I could not ask for more than that. Now I could put the dream to bed rather than lay awake with the nightmare of what could have been.

I learned that baseball like everything else in this life is both fun and serious; that amid the rigors of growing up in the real world I need never be so "serious" that I close the door on the frivolity of my youth.

I also discovered something about my hatred of jocks. My modicum of experience endowed me with respect and admiration for the accomplishments of athletes on the field. But for those athletes who are successful students, those students-athletes, I say to you, never let anyone call you a "jock."

Commerford responds to Haimes, residents of Kress

TOKRESS HALL RESIDENT ASSISTANTS:

I have recently completed an on site, in shower, study of the showers on the second floor of Kress Hall. This initiative was taken in response to a Bucknellian article by Marc Haimes in the September 26th issue. During the five days, I used each of the five showers daily for approximately three minutes and came away with a couple of concerns.

I noted that on three occasions, I experienced a surge of very hot water that residents indicate has almost scalded them. As you know from your experience from home, this surge is caused by the flushing of a toilet in one of the bathrooms. Unfortunately, there is nothing practical that the University can do to correct this situation.

A second matter of concern involves a cold watersurge in one or two showers that I experienced on four of the five days I conducted my study. Specifically, after regulating the water to a suitable temperature, I experienced a very quick (1 second), regular rush of cold water every 30 to 40 seconds. Have you and residents of your floor had a similar experience? Please let me know as soon as possible if this is a problem on your floor so we can move forward to possibly correct this problem.

Many thanks.

Dean Commerford's daily shower record

Date: Saturday, September 26
Time: 7:15 to 7:25 a.m.
Shower #1: Good
Cleanliness: Excellent— for a Saturday morning, but its early. No crud on walls or floor. Spoke with Marc Haimes to tell him what I was up to.

Date: Monday, September 28
Time: 10:35 to 10:50 a.m.
Shower #1: Good
Shower #2: Fair—warm than periodic shot of cold; can be annoying.
Shower #3: Good
Shower #4: Fair—warm than periodic shot of cold
Shower #5: Good
Cleanliness: Three wristbands on floor from weekend; soap wrapper left on window sill; soap wrapper left in soap holder; very clean.

Date: Tuesday, September 29
Time: 9:05 to 9:25 a.m.
Shower #1: Good
Shower #2: Fair—warm than periodic shot of cold; annoying
Shower #3: Good
Shower #4: Good
Shower #5: Fair—warm than periodic shot of cold
Cleanliness: Wristbands still on floor; soap wrapper in same place as yesterday; still very clean.

Date: Wednesday, September 30
Time: 10:40 to 11:00 a.m.
Shower #1: Fair—warm than periodic shot of cold
Shower #2: Good—finally!
Shower #3: Good
Shower #4: Good—shower head pulled off; I play plumber and fix
Shower #5: Good
Cleanliness: Excellent; all wrappers and wristbands picked up and thrown away.
Residents request I take shower earlier on Thursday when a majority of them do to see what more numbers do to the shower.

Date: Thursday, October 1
Time: 8:20 to 8:45 a.m.
Shower #1: Ouch! I finally got hit with a surge of hot water.
Shower #2: Good
Shower #3: Good
Shower #4: Good
Shower #5: Good
Cleanliness: Excellent; I checked with two other students who were up about the showers that day. One student indicated that it was the best shower he has had since he returned to school.

Date: Friday, October 2
Time: 8:40 a.m.
Called Marc to tell him I couldn't make it today. I have a cold.

What the health is going on?

Common health questions answered

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI
Bucknellian Staff Writers

When is the best time to get a flu shot?

Now is the best time to get a flu shot because it takes four to five weeks for the vaccine to become effective. Flu shots will be available every Tuesday from 9-11 a.m. and 2-4 p.m. during the month of October. They are free, and are strongly recommended for people in risk groups, such as those having acquired or congenital heart disease, chronic renal disease or respiratory illness, diabetes, chronic anemias and individuals over age 65. There are side effects which affect people differently, so remember to ask your physician about how they might affect you before getting the shot.

What does an HIV test involve? How accurate are the ones at the Student Health Services?

The HIV test is an easy and reliable test. However, you must remember there is no test specifically for AIDS. The tests that are available indicate if someone has the antibodies to HIV which can lead to AIDS. The most common test is called ELISA (Enzyme-Linked ImmunoSorbent Assay). This test is considered to be 99% correct when testing people who have the antibodies to the AIDS virus. Another specific test is called the Western Blot. This should be performed to confirm that the ELISA test is accurate. If both of these tests are negative and you are practicing unprotected vaginal, anal, or oral sex; sharing needles to inject drugs; had a blood transfusion before April, 1985; or having unprotected intercourse with anyone who has participated in any of these activities, make sure you take a repeat test at a later date (approximately six months) because it takes around three to six months for people who have acquired HIV to develop enough antibodies for the test to turn positive. The Pennsylvania Department of Health office in Lewisburg administers free and anonymous HIV tests every Tuesday. Call 523-1124 for an appointment.

What is the difference between red meat and white meat?

All meat is edible muscle. White meat is usually leaner than red meat. Red meat is not just beef and it is not just meat that is red when raw. Pork and veal are considered red meat even though they are pink when raw. Also, meats such as rabbit and venison might be lean, but they are still red meats. Most meats contain the same cholesterol, while their fat content varies. Some cuts of pork, beef, and lamb can be leaner than some poultry. So, the red color should not scare you away from meat. The thing you should stay away from is meat with streaks of fat (marbling).

How do you know if you have mononucleosis?

Mononucleosis (believed to be caused by the Epstein-Barr virus) is typified by fatigue and may by accompanied by headaches, sore throat, high fever, muscle aches, swelling of the lymph glands, nausea, vomiting, and abdominal pain. Jaundice or a rash may be noticeable as well. If you have any of these symptoms, you should see a doctor whether or not you think you have the virus. A simple blood test will determine if you have mononucleosis.

I have heard about under the skin birth control implants. What are they?

The implants are called Norplant and consist of six capsules (about one inch long) placed under the skin of a woman's upper arm. The minor surgical procedure required takes 10 to 20 minutes (with a local anesthetic) and the protection lasts up to five years. The failure rate is less than 1%. There are certain restrictions and you should have a complete exam before undergoing the procedure. There are also side effects that you should ask your doctor about.

HEALTH EVENTS FOR OCTOBER

Nationally acclaimed speaker Jean Kilbourne will discuss the following health issues:

"Eating Our Hearts Out: The Obsession With Thinness," October 26 at noon in the ELC Forum.

"Under the Influence: The Pushing of Alcohol via Advertising," October 26 at 7:30 p.m., in the Weis Center.

If you have any health questions, please write to Joyce and Lisa at Box C-1553.

Have you ever wondered . . . ?

Where the creek on campus comes from?

BY NANCY NORBECK

Every Bucknellian has seen the small creek that winds its way through campus, and many have certainly wondered where it comes from. The sight of a body of water flowing under the Music and Art building is enough to arouse the curiosity of some; the odd colors sometimes present in the water attract the attention of others.

The creek, a branch of the Buffalo creek, is actually quite short, beginning at the golf course and ending where it joins the Bull Run creek in front of Sigma Alpha Epsilon. Several areas of the creek are intermittent, only filled with water after a rainfall. In the past few years, due to droughts, more areas of the creek are dry. The unnatural colors sometimes visible in the creek are due to the fact that it begins in the golf course, where the chemicals used on the lawn eventually drain into the creek's source.

Traditional pledging rituals commence

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Theta Chi pledge Jason Strauss '95 takes a break from his pledge activities to catch up on studying.

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Now that bid day has come and gone, many Bucknellians are wearing small pins over their heart. These pins symbolize a new-found allegiance to a fraternity or sorority; they indicate a promise or "pledge" to a Greek organization. But what exactly is the purpose of pledging?

Responses from many Greeks, both pledges and initiated members, indicates that the pledge period serves two main purposes:

First, pledges are asked to determine their new role in the organization, as well as to become familiar with the concept of Greek life,and are instructed about the history, ideas and goals of their fraternity or sorority. "It's my understanding that each fraternity requires pledges to learn about the history of the fraternity," said Agustin Rubio '94. "But as for testing the pledges in some form or another about what they've learned will differ from house to house and chapter to chapter. No two houses are going to be the same."

Many Greeks do not specifically discuss their own traditional pledging rituals. Although they are not secret, per se, the traditions tend to be unique to the fraternity or sorority and not a matter of public discussion.

Second, pledging is the time when new members of a Greek organization get to know and bond with other members of their pledge class. They form a unified group which continues the time-honored traditions of their organization as well as contributes new perspectives to the group's ideals. In addition, this period also serves as an opportunity to meet and make friends with all the brothers or sisters in the group. "I think of pledging as a chance to meet all of the older sisters and form special relationships with them," said Pi Beta Phi pledge Kristin Bowen '95.

In the past, pledging a fraternity or sorority often brought one word to mind: hazing. By definition, hazing occurs when an already initiated member, that is a brother or sister, requests that a pledge perform some action that he or she wouldn't otherwise do, or which could be injurious to themselves. Reports of deadly alcohol hazing and personal degredation became common during the 1980's.

Today, however, because of changing attitudes and stricter regulations spurred becausae of negative national attention, pledging a fraternity or sorority is more of a fun time, an opportunity for personal growth and an increased understanding of what the organization will mean to the pledge. "I think there are some preconceived ideas as to what pledging is all about, and it's not at all a time for brothers to treat you badly just because you haven't been initiated yet," said Sigma Alpha Mu pledge Jason Spiegelman '95. "It's a two-way road of respect and the brothers are your friends more than anything else."

There are, however, some duties which pledges are required to perform. In addition to attending pledge education programs set up by the Pan Hellenic or InterFraternity Council, pledge classes are expected to do some form of philanthropic activity or "pledge project."

Bucknell's Greek organizations, like those at many other schools, have established pledge periods which vary in duration. During this time male and female pledges will be paired up with a pop (brother) or big (sister). "Pledges have bigs because that person will be the one to teach her about what the sorority means," said Lindsay Famariss '94. "It also makes it easier for her to feel more at home in the sorority."

Sororities tend to shower the new pledges with attention, hanging signs on their door, sending them notes in the mail and room trashing. While fraternity pledges are also receiving a great deal of attention, they are already helping the brothers with house chores such as cleaning and maintaining the house and grounds.

Pledge periods will end with the pledges' initiation into the fraternity or sorority. Initiation day will vary depending on the organization and, in some instances, the pledge class. Added Rubio, "Pledges used to be initiated into our fraternity when the brothers felt they were completely ready to take on the responsibilities of the house." Some also decide during pledging that Greek life is not for them. Ali Broderick '94 said, "Pledging is a time when you can actually see if that sorority is right for you."

Laurie Liddell '94 said,"You get so much attention during pledge period that you tend to really feel good about your decision. But it is still a good time to evaluate your decision before you make that final commitment to the sorority."

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

"Room trashing" is just one memorable part of the sorority pledging process. Confetti, glitter, streamers and candy from most trashings can be found weeks and even months after the room has been trashed.

Indulge in the Peter Herdic House's creations

BY SCOTT DONALDSON AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Finally, we found a restaurant in Central Pennsylvania with some style and sophistication. The Peter Herdic House, located in the bustling metropolis of Williamsport, dresses its place settings with more than one fork and serves its entrees avec sauces.

This restored Victorian mansion converted into a charming restaurant has been the highlight of our four years of dining experiences in the area. Dinner conversation centered around the fact that each course was more delicious than the last.

For appetizers, we chose to sample the lobster and shrimp ravioli in a cognac sauce ($7.25) and crab cakes with lemon thyme butter ($5.95). We found the black and white striped pasta shells pleasing to the eye as well as the tastebuds. Although lacking the impressive look of the ravioli, the crabcakes were also delicious and a unique variation of the common recipe. Scott, of course, also ordered his favorite—french onion soup ($2.95)—and was delighted with the baked Gruyere cheese topping.

While scanning the menu, the flaming strawberry salad for two ($9.95) immediately caught our eye. We knew that we just had to try it. The presentation of the second course was surprising and quite a spectacle, as our waitress appeared tableside with a cart adorned with Grand Marnier, strawberry schnapps, sesame seeds, honey, fresh strawberries, and crisp spinach leaves. The salad immediately lived up to its name as the Grand Marnier shot up in a tall flame. The spinach and strawberry combination tasted sweet, almost like a dessert.

Fully satisfied after the appetizers and salad, we could have finished our wine and headed home. Tender tournedos of beef with crab and wild mushrooms ($18.95) and chicken and shrimp in a delicate amaretto sauce ($13.95) were being prepared for us, though.

Upon tasting both entrees, Susan decided that being overweight wouldn't be such a bad thing if she gained the pounds by feasting like this every night. While not completely medium well done as requested, the beef was primed to near perfection and literally blanketed in chunks of crabmeat and mushrooms. The portion of shrimp and chicken was not as generous as that of the beef, but the taste was more distinctive. We savored the amaretto sauce on the shrimp and chicken much more than the light herb cream sauce on the beef. The tinge of amaretto was unusual and left the amateur chef guessing and yearning for just one more taste.

The desserts on the Peter Herdic House menu range from peanut butter pie to raspberry cassis to ganache torte. Hot buttered rum apple pie ($2.25) was one of the dessert specials, however, and since Susan had found it so flaky and layered with something delicious that tasted like big chunks of brown sugar upon her first visit to the restaurant, she decided to test it again. The dessert stood up to memory as the best apple pie to be tried yet.

The menu was, in general, much more progressive than any other in the area. All selections are unusual in some way or another. The wine and after dinner drink list is also diverse and worthy of more than a glance.

Our only complaint of the evening was the background music. Somehow the fifties beat did not add much to the otherwise intimate atmosphere of polite service, candlelight and fresh flowers upon every table.

The second floor of the old mansion contains private dining rooms for small parties and the third floor is a widow's watch filled with windows for watching the sun set or locating Orion.

Next time you have reason to celebrate or impress, drive to Williamsport, and indulge in the food of the Peter Herdic House.

Bison take turnover festival from Lions, 29-22

Dan Zappa '94 displays defensive skills in win over Columbia; BU drowned by Green Wave monsoon at Dartmouth two weeks ago, 44-14

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

While Bucknell's 29-22 victory over Columbia was certainly entertaining, the quality of play in the game certainly did not make anyone think of New Year's Day.

The Bison capitalized on the tenth of the game's eleven turnovers as Matt Noll '93 intercepted Chad Andrzejewski's pass and returned it 27 yards for the game-winning score midway through the fourth quarter. Noll's grab was one of four interceptions thrown by Columbia quarterbacks on the day. With two minutes left in the game, Andrzejewski led Columbia into Bison territory when linebacker Dan Zappa '94 picked him off to prevent any comeback by the Lions.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

The Bison defense tunes up in practice last week before it went on to face Columbia in NY. The reps seemingly paid off, as Bucknell edged out the Lions in a game in which the defense scored twelve points and forced seven turnovers. The Bison D will look to repeat its performance next week against Holy Cross on the Crusaders home soil.

On a day in which Bucknell as a team lacked intensity, Zappa came up huge on defense. In addition to his game-saving interception, Zappa led the way with 14 tackles, including two sacks. Zappa's third quarter sack of Andrzejewski forced a fumble, which John Lusk '93 picked up and returned 33 yards for a touchdown.

Cecil Boone '94 also provided a big defensive play, as he blocked a short Columbia field goal attempt with the score at 22-22 in the third quarter.

Once again the Bison offense looked decent, with Matt Walsh '93 leading the rushing attack with 122 yards on the ground. His three-yard touchdown run on the Bison's first drive of the day gave them a 7-0 lead. The personal-best effort for Walsh put him over the 1,000-yard career plateau. This is quite an accomplishment for the converted wideout, who did not begin to carry the bulk of the rushing load until this season.

Quarterback Travis Kopp '95 also had another impressive outing. Kopp, who went into the game sixth in the Division I-AA quarterback rankings, completed 18 of 28 passes for 179 yards and one touchdown pass. Wideout Whitey Berardinelli '93 snared four passes and Damon Garner '94 hauled in seven, but Kopp's favorite target continues to be tight end Mark Gentile '95. The converted quarterback caught a six-yard touchdown pass to give the Bison a 14-7 lead in the first quarter, and in the third quarter he pulled down a two-point conversion to make the score 22-16.

Wideout Whitey Berardinelli '93 snared four passes and Damon Garner '94 hauled in seven, but Kopp's favorite target continues to be tight end Mark Gentile '95.

Later in the third quarter Andrzejewski rolled to his right and found his wide receiver Mike Mundt open over the middle for a 15-yard touchdown. However, the extra point hit the left upright, leaving the score tied. That set the stage for Noll's game-winning play in the fourth.

"We were very fortunate to win the game," said head coach Lou Maranzana afterwards. "Columbia had every chance to win. Their offense did everything we expected, but we had trouble all day with their short passing game. We were fortunate to step in front of a few passes."

Two weekends ago, the Bison were blitzed by an overwhelming Dartmouth squad, 44-14, in Hanover, NH. During last year's season, The Green Wave also dominated the Bison 34-16, on their home soil.

This year was no different as Bucknell's offense only managed 55 net rushing yards on 23 carries, and controlled the ball for only twenty minutes of the game. The hosts, meanwhile, were hardly gracious, as they stacked up 483 yards on offense.

Gentile and Kevin McElvene '93 scored the Blue and Orange's two touchdowns. Gentile was on the receiving end of 40-yard pass from Kopp to open the scoring, while McElvene tallied a rushing touchdown early in the final period after a three yard plunge that rounded out the Bison scoring for the afternoon.

The Bison moved out to 7-0 advantage in the first quarter, but there after, the Green Wave ran off 41 staright points and cruised to an easy victory.

With this loss, Bucknell falls to 1-3 in its series with Dartmouth. Its only victory came in 1989.

Bucknell is idle this week, then it will play against the troubled Holy Cross Crusaders (1-4) on Oct. 24. The Bison, who are now 3-3 on the year, will hope to get over the .500 mark against the Crusaders, who are the riches-to-rags story of the Patriot League this season after losing head coach Mark Duffner to the University of Maryland. The Bison received a 42-6 punishing from Holy Cross last year in Lewisburg, but the Crusaders are currently a shadow of their 1991 team.

EXTRA POINTS

—In his fourth year as head coach of the Bison, Lou Maranzana claims an overall record of 15-21.

—Bucknell has won five straight meetings against Columbia, dating back to 1985.

—The Bison have split their two games against Ivy League teams this year and own a dismal record of 20-70-3 against these opponents.

H_2O polo competes at Mid-Atlantic Games and EWPL tourney

BY MATT ZARTMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On the weekend of Oct. 3-4, the Bucknell water polo team traveled to Army to compete in the Mid-Atlantic League Games. The tournament included some of the tougher opponents that the Bison will face this year, and it was important for them to play well against these teams.

The first game of the weekend was against Princeton and, despite a loss to the Tigers during the pre-season, coach John Zeigler '91 believed that his young team would be able to be competitive with them during the seasonal matchup. However, the strong Princeton team outplayed the Bison.

"They were able to take advantage of our weaknesses," said Zeigler of the 18-9 drubbing. "We were never really able to set up our offense, and we made mistakes and were never really able to play our game."

Problems continued for Bucknell as it dropped its second game of the day to Villanova, 10-8.

Zeigler said of the game, "We were waiting for something to happen, and we didn't put the game away. We didn't play intense water polo." Sunday proved to be the turning point for the team as it played Army, and was able to salvage something positive from the disappointing weekend by squeaking out a 13-12 win.

Coach Zeigler was pleased with the way that his team bounced back from the day before, saying, "We finally started to play our game, and we were able to build an eight-to-five halftime lead."

In the second half, Army was able to close the gap because the Bison began to, as Zeigler said, "show their youth."

"We were really pumped up to win," said Nick Bijur '95, "but it seemed that we kept trying to give it away." In the end, the team was able to hold on to its lead.

The Eastern Waterpolo League Games were already viewed by the Bison as being an important tournament, but the disappointing showing at Army made the EWPL even more critical. An overtime loss to Richmond in the first tournament of the season had been bothering the team over the last several weeks and, according to Bijur, "We were all really excited when we found out that we got to play Richmond again. I'd be really surprised if we lost to them this time."

"We were all really excited when we found out that we got to play Richmond again. I'd be really surprised if we lost to them this time."
—Nick Bijur '95

A win over Richmond would not have only helped the Orange and Blue's pride, but it would negate its earlier loss to the Spiders and improve Bucknell's ranking.

"All of our games from here on out are going to be very important," said Zeigler.

Zeigler was also very confident last Friday before the team left for Brown, saying, "We had an excellent week of practice and we're ready to rise up to the next level."

The first game was against an inferior George Washington team, who the Bison handled easily by a score of 16-7. The second game of the day was against host Brown and, despite playing a tough game throughout, the Bison suffered a 9-6 loss. Improved play was evident at this point, and Zeigler was pleased with his team's effort despite the loss.

On Sunday the awaited rematch with Richmond took place, and the Bison were able to redeem themselves with a satisfying 10-6 victory.

"We came out with a lot of intensity, and we were able to control the tempo of the game," said Zeigler of the important triumph.

The final game of the weekend was against a strong University of Massachussetts team. The score was tied at three at halftime, but in the second half the Orange and Blue's offense fell asleep, and UMass came out on top by a score of 12-5. Zeigler believed that the game would have been much closer except for the fact that Bucknell ran out of energy in the second half after playing two games virtually back-to-back. UMass, meanwhile, was playing its first game of the day.

Zeigler attributed some of Bucknell's improvement to the bettered play of team captain Steve Benson '93. Benson led the team in scoring in the first three games of the weekend, and he was confident that the team would be able to continue its improved play. "We were happy with how we played. Obviously we were mad that we lost, but we played well," said Benson. "We always get pumped up for when we play at Brown, and they've always been one of our strong rivals."

Most importantly, the weekend showcased the mental toughness of the team, as it was able to bounce back from the losses at Army to beat several good teams a week later.

Tomorrow the water polo team will play Navy at 1:30 p.m. and then Queens at 5 p.m. On Sunday, the Bison face Slippery Rock at 9 a.m. and then Iona at 2 p.m. This weekend will also reveal whether the team can continue its improvement.

Now you see it, now you don't: women's soccer offense vanishes

Deb Hildebrandt—The Bucknellian

Backer Stephanie Porcaro '93 winds up in practice in preparation for the women's soccer team's Patriot League competition. The senior co-captain has watched the team go 0-5-1 in its last six games, and lose all of its offensive firepower in being shut out in its last four.

In a major derailment of its 1992 campaign, Bucknell's women's soccer team suffered four consecutive shutout losses in the past two weeks. This dismal performance extended the team's winless streak to seven games, including one tie.

Bucknell's last victory was almost an entire month ago, on Sept. 19 versus Holy Cross.

The defense in the last four games has played well, limiting the opponents to only ten goals. "We are really frustrated. Our defense has held us in the games," said Kerry Mack '95. "We have not been moving enough off the ball."

A crucial problem with the defense has been its inability to consistently transfer the ball to the offense. When the offense has gained possession of the ball it has been impotent, though, and bad luck has destroyed some of the best opportunities it has had to score.

Defender Jen Giordano '95 commented, "We need better communication and cohesiveness," while Megan Coyne '95 lamented the fact that "the defense is just clearing the ball. They are not passing the ball to specific offensive players."

The first defeat of the last two weeks occurred at West Point, where Army silenced the Bison 2-0 with a pair of goals by Selina Devine. Bucknell was outshot 13-7, but Kim Fekel '93 performed admirably for the Bison, recording 11 saves.

Four days later, Bucknell succumbed at Bloomsburg by the same score. Denise Pecoraro was credited with scores that came with 18:41 and 17:27 left in the second half. Again, Bucknell was outshot (12-7), and again Fekel turned in another laudable effort, stopping 11 shots.

Last Saturday, playing before a sparse crowd after most Bucknell students had vacated the University to enjoy Fall Break, the Bison lost to league rival Lafayette, 3-0. All goals for the Leopards came in the first half.

Heidi Caruso, last season's Patriot League Most Valuable Player, initiated the Lafayette onslaught with a goal only five minutes into the game.

Twelve minutes later, the Leopards' Nancy Cianfrocca shot from 40 yards out, and the ball hit the left goalpost and bounced back five yards in front of the goal. Unfortunately, Fekel did not anticipate that the ball would rebound off of the post and was therefore caught offguard. An alert Stephanie Licht immediately put the loose ball in the unguarded net.

Giordano, meanwhile, had both of her shots caught by Lafayette's goalkeeper Dawn Schauder in the first half, and a direct kick by freshman Kerry McDonnell bounced off of the goal post.

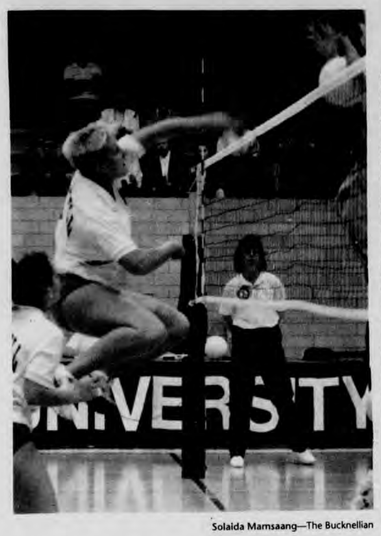
Women's volleyball has winless week

Losses to Robert Morris, Navy and Lehigh bring losing streak to nine games



Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Outside hitter Heather Hoehn '94 sends a blistering spike over the net in a practice session last week. The Lady Spikers have fallen on hard times over the last month, having dropped eight matches in a row. The women's volleyball team will look to turn its season around this weekend against Fordham and Colgate in New York.

BY ERIC BIRNBAUM
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After returning to the East from their fruitless Alaskan journey, the women's volleyball team hoped to fare better as it hosted Robert Morris and Navy at home on Oct. 3.

The Lady Spikers looked to improve on their 2-11 record by first opposing Navy. Bucknell came out strong and showed the Middies that they would not be pushed around, handing them a 15-13 defeat in the opening game. However, this brief moment of glory was quickly dismissed as Navy came roaring back to finish off the Bison 15-2, 15-11 and 15-8. Aubrey Schneggenburger '95 led the Spikers with 12 kills and an impressive 48% hitting accuracy. Heather Hoehn '94 also recorded ten kills in the losing effort.

> "Are we going to have the character to turn it around?"
> —Head coach Cindy Opalski

In the following match versus Robert Morris, the Bison came out uninspired and listless, and were shellacked 15-4, 15-2 and 15-10. Bucknell collected a mere 16 kills throughout the match, and the team as a whole accumulated a combined 24% hitting accuracy during the entire three-game set.

"We're playing un-intense volleyball," said coach Cindy Opalski, who is concerned about her team's recent play. "We are losing games that we should be winning. It seems the only games that we win are the ones against each other during practice."

The Lady Spikers looked to turn matters around in Bethlehem on Oct. 7, when they went up against Lehigh. Unfortunately, matters remained the same and Bucknell fell badly,15-2, 15-13, 15-1. The Bison only tallied a total of 19 kills in 67 attempts. Schneggenberger led the Bison with six kills, while Hoehn, who ranks second on the squad behind Katie Steele '96 with 14 solo blocks, collected four kills and a solo block.

Looking at what has been a poor season as of yet, Opalski raises the question, "Are we going to have the character to turn it around? Can we make a negative into a positive? It's time for a gut check."

So the query remains, as it has for the entire season: Will the Lady Spikers play to their potential, or will they continue to play like a 2-14 team? The grueling part of the Patriot League season stares the Bison cold in the face in the coming weeks, and if they are going to make their move, it will have to be soon.

"The challenge is now," Opalski said, in reference to Bucknell's matchups with Fordham and Colgate in New York this weekend.

In the first 20 minutes of the second half, Giordano had her shot from 30 yards out sail high over the net, and three shots by Lisa Gibbons '95 were foiled by the Lafayette goalkeeper.

Bucknell missed two prime chances to score in the last 15 minutes of the game after Kara Patrick '96 made a great pass to McDonnell, whose kick sailed over the net, and another when a Giordano shot hit the side of the net.

Prior to its meeting with the Bison, Lafayette was winless in its first two league games this year, and so Leopard head coach Dan Magner was pleased to gain a victory against Bucknell. "Six of our last nine games we outshot our opponents, but did not put away those opportunities," said Magner. "Today, we took advantage of the opportunities we had. Our shots were accurate."

Magner had special praise for Caruso. "Today was her best game [of the season]. She is very talented," the coach said later. "She scored a total of 35 goals the past two seasons. Her goal today was her fourth of this season—hopefully, she is back into the groove."

Magner also lauded his goalkeeper. "Schauder played very well. Bucknell had 22 shots. She made some great saves."

Last Tuesday, Temple cruised to a 4-1 victory over the Bison in Philadelphia. Bucknell was outshot by a ghastly margin of 20-6, and Fekel played a decent game, stopping 10 Temple shots.

With 14:45 left in the first half, Bucknell's Kristin Lay '95 scored a goal with an assist credited to Jessica Wright '95. Temple evened the score a minute and a half later, and then slammed in an additional three goals to finish off the Bison.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

In a game last week that helped to round out Bucknell's B-League intramural soccer regular season, the Untucked Shirtsles and Kappa Sigma tied 1-1 at the Mod fields. Scouts from both the Baltimore Blast professional indoor soccer organization and the Bayern-Munich Ingolstadts (European League) were on hand in the hope of coming away with some of the Susquehanna Valley's finest ball-handling talent. A franchise representative from the Chicago Bears was also in attendance, saying that the club was shopping for a new field goal kicker. When pressed on the issue, the rep explained that "That Kevin Butler guy looks too much like a little black beetle" in a Chicago helmet for their tastes. Andy Hubley '95 scored for the Shirtsles, while Greg Gillies '93 netted Kappa Sig's lone goal.

Men's soccer gets first league win

Romp over Lafayette is sandwiched between losses to Rider, Army

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Midfielder Rcih Shaheen '95 (numer 7) challenges a Rider opponent while Backer Brian Buck '95 (number 2) trails the play. The visiting Rider squad proved too powerful for the Bison two weeks ago in Lewisburg, and went on to double up on Bucknell 4-2.

It loomed as the beginning of the toughest section of the fierce Bison schedule, and entailed two Patriot League matches preceded by a larger-than-life non-league opponent. The only question for Bucknell was, which team was going to show up for these contests? Would it be the squad that battled Colgate fiercely into overtime, or the team that was shut out by Bloomsburg? Fortunately, it was the former of the two that took on Army and Lafayette this past week.

On Tuesday night, the Black Knights of the Hudson ventured to Lewisburg. It was a typical performance for the U.S. Army: methodical, conservative, yet quick to take advantage of the slightest error. And, despite perhaps their best effort of the year, the Bison fell 3-0 to the powerful Cadets.

The loss was nothing to be ashamed of. Army entered the game 8-2-1, good for second place in the Patriot League. Prior to the Bucknell game, they defeated Lehigh (3-1), and Hartwick (2-1), a team that was ranked 16th in the country entering the match.

Bucknell (5-6) looked strong, especially in the first half. The team outshot the Cadets 8-4 in the half and were even in corners, 4-4. However, in the 35th minute, Army capitalized on a slight opening in the defense due to a bit of hustle and determination. An Army midfielder lunged after and saved a ball that was headed out of bounds. The ball went directly to Cadet Chip Krotee '93, who dribbled a little closer to the goal and ripped a left-footed shot past goalkeeper Mark Wrigley '94 from 20 yards out.

In the second half, the Bison were witness to a memorable effort from one of the best squads in the country. Perhaps the finest example of this was Army's second goal. It took the Cadets only four minutes into the second half to score, once again by taking advantage of a slight crack in the Orange and Blue's armor. Wrigley made several good saves in front of the goal, but was sucked away from the net as the ball popped out of the box, nearly thirty yards from the goal. The junior recovered in time, but was beaten by a blistering shot that even Superman could not have stopped.

Still and all, there were many positives to take away from the contest. Even a loss against Army, because it was a strong performance, should give the Bison momentum heading into their next match against Fordham this Saturday.

On Oct.10 the Bison traveled to Bethlehem, Pa. to take on rival Lafayette. This was a must-win game, as the Bison had been winless in League play up to this point. They looked strong and dominated the scoreboard, as Alex Kogan '94 scored the first goal in the 42nd minute on an assist from Greg Beatty '95.

Bucknell opened the scoring again in the second half, this time with a goal by Ryan Bucceri '94. He scored again 35 seconds later to close the book on the Leopards. Beatty assisted on both of Bucceri's goals, and with 6 goals and 4 assists on the year, Beatty now sits atop the Patriot League in scoring. Wrigley continued his excellent play and recorded his third shutout of the season with eight saves.

The previous week, the Bison lost to Rider 4-2, despite two goals by leading scorer Beatty and five saves from Wrigley. Bucknell simply came out slow against a hot opponent, falling behind by a score of 3-1 by halftime.

This week the Bison take on Fordham and non-league opponent Delaware.

Golf ends season at West Point

JONATHAN M. BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

After faring well at the ECAC Qualifier on Oct. 1, the Bison golfers returned to the links at the West Point Tournament on Oct. 3 and 4.

Unfortunately, Bucknell played poorly, placing 12th out of the 15 teams that competed. Army, the host team, won the tournament with a two-day, two-round team total of 596 strokes. James Madison edged Farleigh-Dickinson for second place, 602 to 605.

Bucknell individual scoring saw some positive performances by David Fries '93 and Paul Gregory '95. Fries shot a 77 in the first round, followed by an 81 in his second round for a total of 158. Gregory fired an 82 in his first round. He improved upon that performance in his second round, turning in an 80, for a two-round total of 162. Other notable scores included Doug Dollenberg '94, who shot a disappointing two round total of 166 (84-82).

Coach Tommy Thompson was disappointed with the team's performance, but was quick to add a positive note to the results: Lehigh, Lafayette, and Fordham, all Patriot League foes, placed well behind Bucknell.

"Even though we did not play very well at West Point, we still got a good indication of where we may stand in the spring," said Thompson. "Beating Lafayette, Lehigh, and Fordham gives us an idea of what we need to prepare for come springtime."

The formal fall season has ended for all but one Bison golfer, as Dollenberg will journey to Colgate to play in the ECAC Fall Classic. The junior's two-over par round of 74 at the ECAC qualifier was good enough to place him in the individual competition. In preparing for the tournament, Thompson advised Dollenberg to clear his mind.

"Doug had a tough few rounds at West Point. I told him that he ought to stay away from golf for a few days, just to help him clear his mind and stay focused for the ECAC's."

Dollenberg will need to really connect with the ball, as distance is the biggest adversary on the Colgate course.

For all other Bison golfers, the fall season is officially over. In assessing the results of the fall, Thompson liked what he saw.

"I am very pleased with how the fall went. All reactions are positive and I hope we will carry the momentum into the spring season."

In the off-season, the squad will polish its skills, weather permitting. During the first part of the second semester, the players will return to the links, competing in mostly captains practices and skills drills. March 9 and 10 will mark the beginning of official spring practices.

Moving into the spring season, Thompson sees his nucleus consisting of five golfers, each of whom enjoyed tournament competition this fall. After compiling a fall average of 78.8 strokes per round, Dollenberg will return as the favorite for the number one spot. Other competitors include Fries (80 strokes), Drew Smith '95 (80.2 strokes), Paul Gregory '95 (80.2 strokes), and Jeff Graf '96, who maintained a 78 strokes per round average in two rounds. Coach Thompson said he will also be looking at a number of other players who showed potential during this past semester.

Thompson looks forward to the spring season with enthusiasm. Confidence and consistency will be the key ingredients for Bucknell success in the Patriot League next spring.

maintain that he didn't have possession), and Tech grabbed the lead away, 21-17.

At the halftime gun, the extra point ball sailed over the net and into the crowd, where it stayed for the next twenty minutes as about nine thousand fans played catch. Doug, Eric and I kept screaming that we were open, but to no avail. The students cheered when someone threw a bullet, and razzed any wobbly chucks, and I kept thinking to myself, Real life, real consequences!

It came over the loudspeaker that Bucknell was tied with Columbia at 22 in the third quarter, and Eric swiveled around to give me an encouraging smile. I shrugged. How could I talk trash with a guy who goes to an ACC school? I fought down the urge to brag about our convincing win over Bloomsburg.

Throughout the third quarter, Maryland kept fighting. So did the state cops—they had thrown out three fans already for pelting Don Ho with food from the concession stands. I felt sorry for the guy; after all, he was only trying to lead cheers.

The Terps pulled to 28-19, then 28-26, and the people in the stands around me were deliriously falling all over the place, dropping their coats onto the concrete, sweating on me. Doug's high-fives were nearly knocking me over. This was football!

With time running out in the game, the Maryland QB put up a prayer into the end zone. It came down into a flailing mob of red, gold, and black, and I was hard-pressed to see who caught the ball. So, apparently, did the rest of the crowd; for at least two seconds, the thirty thousand people in the stadium were completely silent. It was one of the most eerie experiences I can recall undergoing.

Then a Tech defensive back popped up merrily with the pigskin, and the crowd groaned as one to break the quietude. The game clock read 0:00; I looked down at my feet to see Eric huddled in a fetal position, as if he had just been hit in the groin with a nine-iron. He doesn't take these types of things well.

To his credit, Doug maintained a poker face in his disappointment—he usually is the strong one. Myself, if I had had a marshmallow in my hand, someone would've been bleeding. We consoled one another later that night at Eric's frat house.

On Sunday, Doug, my two brothers Chris and John, and I kept track of a dozen NFL games over the course of the afternoon. My system was overloading, but I didn't yet care. It should have been obvious when I wrapped Ace bandages around my arms, picked up a football, and started to ask John and Chris to tackle me. It's not every day that you ask your siblings to knock you down to the carpet, and I was remiss in not recognizing my problem.

They didn't bite, and so I began to simulate fumbles in the family room by bouncing the ball off of their shins and pouncing on it. This got the desired response, and soon I was literally at the bottom of a pile of my own flesh and blood. The pain was exquisite.

It was at this juncture that my dad instructed me to put the ball out in the garage and leave it there.

Cut to that evening, where, with my dad and brothers, I ate it up as a certain team from Washington pounded a certain team from Denver, 34-3, and a certain wide receiver named Art Monk set a certain all-time record for pass receptions with his 820th catch in the last two minutes of play.

When Monk pulled in that historic hitch pass ten yards downfield, his teammates stormed onto the field, the crowd at R.F.K. stadium rocked the stands, and D.C. momentarily forgot that it was the murder capital of the United States. The game's referees, sensing the profound nature of the event, declined to penalize the Redskins for a delay of game as the players hoisted the quiet and humble veteran onto their shoulders. This was football, too.

Not suprisingly, I slept well that night.

The next day found me traveling up Route 15 back to Bucknell, as my whirlwind break had drawn to a close. I tried to talk my brother into one last game of catch, but he declined. I suppose he figured that it would detract from his driving too much.

So, I was kind of forced into football withdrawal, albeit temporarily.

Tomorrow, after all, is Saturday.

Dan Zappa '94

Linebacker Dan Zappa '94 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of October 16 following his game-breaking defensive effort in Bucknell's 29-22 win over Columbia last Saturday. Zappa racked up 15 tackles (14 of which were solo takedowns) against the Lions and tallied two sacks.

The junior also forced a pair of fumbles and intercepted a pass with 2:19 left in the game to ensure the Bison victory.

Zappa hails from Pittsburgh, Pa. and is majoring in business administration.

Men's X-country finishes 9th at Indiana

Men remain unbeaten; women drop to 2-2 after loss to Delware

LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On Oct. 3, the men's cross country team ran its record to 5-0 after sweeping a tri-meet with Delaware and Drexel in New Jersey. The Bison squeaked out a 26-31 victory over the Blue Hens and breezed pass the Dragons, 15-50.

The harriers showed their depth and talent by having a different runner cross the line first for the third week in a row. Tom Eagleson '93 took top honors among the Bison runners and second overall with a time of 26:41. Following him were classmates Jim Farrer '93 and Michael Bronson '93, who crossed the finish line together in fourth and fifth places (respectively) with a time of 27:09. The final two members of the Blue and Orange quintet, Jeremy Hirneisen '93 and Judd Jarden '93, also recorded identical times, 27:20, which placed them in the seventh and eighth positions.

The following week, the home squad took its unbeaten record on the road, this time to the Hoosier state of Indiana. Bucknell's performance here would prove crucial, since it would be the same 5K course on which the NCAA Championships will be run later this season.

The team was also to compete against the caliber of teams like nationally-ranked Navy, who was at the ninth position and the eventual winner of the Invitational, and Wake Forest, at the number twelve spot.

The Bison laced up their shoes and turned in an excellent performance, finishing ninth in the field of 41 formidable teams. En route to their ninth-place finish, Bucknell's runners finished ahead of four teams that have received votes in the Top 20 poll this year.

The top four harriers finished within eight seconds of one another, with Jarden leading the way with a forty-ninth place finish overall. The senior recorded a time of 25:48.

The women's cross country team, however, was not as fortunate, as they were defeated by the Blue Hens from Delaware, 22-33. The opposing runners swiped three of the top four places in order to notch the victory. This race followed a usual pattern, as Kristen Opdyke '93 led the Bison and was the overall winner with a time of 18:49, a full fourteen seconds ahead of her nearest competitor. Maria Ryan '96 showcased her talents, finishing fifth with a time of 19:51.

The Bison had to once again run without Gina Abraham '93, though, as she continues to be hampered by a foot injury.

Unlike the men, the women's team did not travel to Indiana. The lone competitor there for the Lady Bison was Opdyke, who once again showed that she can run with the best, placing thirty-fifth with a time of 18:34.

Tomorrow morning at 11:00 a.m., the men and women will face off against Millersville here in the friendly confines Lewisburg.

turing the first league crown. The Orange and Blue finished 13.5 points ahead of second-place Colgate.

The number-one seed at first singles, Diaz was outdistanced by Eryan MacKool of Lafayette, the tournament's Most Outstanding Player, 1-6, 6-4, 7-6 (7-5). Lutter, at second singles, was beaten in straight sets by an opponent from Lehigh, 6-1, 6-4.

Overall, this was a day for the babies of the bunch to shine. The singles freshman trio of Weihl (fourth singles), Allen (fifth singles), and Anhood (sixth singles) captured three individual titles. Weihl won 6-4, 7-6 (7-3), while classmate Allen won in straight sets 6-3, 6-2 and rookie Anhood outlasted her opponent in three sets, 6-1, 3-6, 6-1.

The doubles competition saw the performances of two tandems dressed in the orange and blue of Bucknell. With their singles title securely locked up, Weihl and Allen looked to double their pleasure but were beaten in straight sets by Colgate's duo of Ali DeSano and Cara Eckert, 6-4, 6-4. Lutter, looking to avenge her earlier defeat, teamed up with McMillan and, despite a valiant effort, lost after taking their opponents from Lehigh the distance, 7-6 (8-6), 4-6, 6-3.

say, Bucknell suffered through a difficult match, as it entailed both a yellow and red card being charged to the team, and another injury to attacker Almira Baldwin '94.

Baldwin once more sustained a head injury that required stitches when she was struck by a stick during the contest. The junior checked into a local hospital in California for treatment and returned to Lewisburg earlier this week.

"Overall, I was not disappointed with the way we came out. Three games in four days in that weather isn't easy," Lewis said. "The trip was a great experience for them. They got a lot closer and learned a lot about each other—you really have to when spending six days always together."

The Bison continue their roller-coaster season tomorrow when they take a winning record to Towson State and then host LaSalle on Sunday.

Commentary
Confessions of a junkie

My name is Pooky, and I am an addict.

My weakness, you see, is not for a controlled substance, but for a game. And this past weekend, during Fall Break, I overdosed in front of my friends and family. All in all, it was a humbling experience.

Things got rolling as soon as I arrived back in Maryland on Friday and met up with a couple of my high school friends Doug and Eric, who attended the state university at College Park. Our conversation quickly turned to the centerpiece of the weekend—that being the gridiron matchup against #17 Georgia Tech at Byrd Stadium the next day—and my eyes started to glaze over with anticipation.

Television cameras. Big crowd. Real-life misdemeanors being committed in the bleachers. This was what college weekends were for, and we would be there the next day. A small fleck of drool began to trickle out of the left corner of my mouth, but then the chatter veered to another subject.

Someone mentioned that our high school team was still ranked number one in the Washington Post's Virginia-Maryland-D.C. area at 5-0. We stuck out our chests slightly, even though we knew that we weren't as good as people thought we were. In retrospect, I suppose that it was this type of negative thinking that was our downfall, because our Screamin' Eagles were upset by an unranked bunch of namby-pambies that evening by two touchdowns. Go figure.

At any rate, Doug and I met up with Eric the next day in his room on Maryland's campus, where we proceeded to watch the Penn State-Miami game before the main event (the thought occurs to me at this point that that's a pretty goofy-sounding statement). Even though the boy has zero affiliation with the state, Eric has always been a Nittany Lions fan for some unfathomable reason, and he was screaming for the majority of the contest in testosterone-laden agony because Penn State was playing like garbage. I heckled him gleefully since, for some unfathomable reason, I hate Penn State more than the Bubonic plague.

It should be added here that I was doing this from the top bunk of Eric's loft, where he could not take a swipe at me. I'm not what doctors would call a big man.

Sitting on the floor with his soupy chili, Doug amusedly viewed the spectacle from afar.

After PSU lost its shot at a national championship, 17-14, and Eric officially declared that Paterno's season was over, we headed off to the stadium for the Tech game. My glands upgraded their action to Def-Con 4. The question was, would the contest live up to my mental billing?

As the French say, oui. It was a beautiful Saturday afternoon, sunny and cloudless. A large and rowdy crowd was on hand. The band was loud. Chants were being led by some fat guy on a platform who reminded me of a youthful Don Ho. Students hurled tennis balls and marshmallows at the state policemen who were patrolling the sidelines. This was football at its finest!

The Terps played Georgia Tech hard for the majority of the first two quarters, and were up by a field goal with ten or so seconds left before the half.

When the Yellowjackets' Shawn Jones hawked up a Hail Mary from sixty yards away, I was already examining the lint in my navel and looking forward to the marching band. Unfortunately, a Georgia receiver came down with the ball (I still

Women's tennis seizes league crown

Talented freshmen Erika Anhood, Sara Allen, and Lauren Weihl win singles titles, power Bison through tourney

BY DAN TARDITI
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Beyond a doubt, the women's tennis team continued to remain the featured fall sports team at Bucknell over the past fourteen days. Last week began with the disappointing end of its 25-match winning streak—the third-longest such streak in Bison history—at the hands of Seton Hall, 3-6. Nevertheless, the team rebounded from the defeat and let the champagne bottles flow this weekend in Lewisburg after it captured its first Patriot League title. From there, the squad's 11-1 record remained untested as its matches this past week against UMBC and Millersville were cancelled.

Julia Diaz '95 went into the Patriot League Championships with an 8-2 record, yet she was denied the #1 singles title for the second year in a row.

Bucknell cruised to its first victory during this run over LaSalle, 9-0, as every match was won by the Bison in straight sets. Julia Diaz '95 played a tough match and ended up on top, defeating Monica Rave, 6-4, 6-3. Kristina Lutter '95 added to her perfect season record, winning 6-2, 6-2 over Jeanne Montana. Kymm Carlson '94 helped lead the way with an easy win over Kim Gibbons, 6-0, 6-1. Other winners included Lauren Weihl '96, 6-0, 6-1; Sara Allen '96, 6-1, 6-1; and Christine McMillan '95, 6-2, 6-1.

> Bucknell, having captured the regular-season title with a 6-0 league mark, had its sights on the championship title after finishing in the runner-up position just a year ago.

In doubles play the team dominated again. Diaz and Carlson won 6-0, 6-1, while Weihl and Allen trashed their competition, 6-0, 6-2. The duo of Lutter and McMillan raised its season record 2s doubles partners to a surprising 4-1 with a 6-1, 6-0 triumph.

The team then traveled north and experienced its first loss of the season to the Pirates of Seton Hall. Diaz lost a well-played match, 3-6, 1-6, to Kristen Downing, and Lutter won a tough second set, 6-3, 7-6 (7-2) for a win over Stacy Loring. Carlson lost to Hope McGratty, 2-6, 4-6, while Weihl lost to Sharla Caico, 2-6, 2-6.

One bright spot was Allen's impressive 6-1, 6-2 thrashing of Pirate Tami Galeai. McMillan rounded out the singles play by losing to Jen O'Neil, 2-6, 1-6.

The doubles combos had their share of troubles as well, as Diaz and Carlson lost 2-6, 2-6. Weihl and Allen lost a difficult match, 4-6, 4-6, yet the tandem of Lutter and McMillan prevented the doubles sweep by defeating their opponents in straight sets 6-4, 6-0.

Unfortunately for their next opponent, the hapless Crusaders from Holy Cross, the Bison sought vengance, and they got it by destroying the opposition 9-0.

Diaz dominated, 6-2, 6-1, over Kathy Melli. Lutter raised her season record to a scintillating 11-0 with a win over Sara Mick, 6-1, 6-2. Carlson defeated Pam Piretti handily, 6-0, 6-0, while Weihl won over Dividra O'Brien, 6-2, 6-1. Allen rallied from a tough second set to win easily in the third set, 7-6, 4-6, 6-1, and Anhood won in straight sets, 6-1, 6-2.

In doubles action, Diaz and Carlson posted 6-0, 6-2 victories. Weihl and Allen cruised to a 6-0, 6-2 victory, and Lutter and McMillan completed the sweep of the match by tallying a 6-1, 6-3 win.

The matches during the week, though, seemed to be a warm-up for the action of the Patriot League Championships. Bucknell, having captured the regular-season title with a 6-0 league mark, had its sights on the championship title after finishing in the runner-up position just a year ago. Field hockey: How the West was won, lost, and tied

Bucknell moves over the .500 mark after emotional three-game trip to California and OT victory at home

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The past two weeks were, to say the least, interesting ones for the Bucknell field hockey team. The Bison (6-5-1) went 2-1-1 over this stretch of time, kicking it all off with an overtime victory over Lehigh and finishing out West with mixed results against Stanford, Pacific, and California.

The Orange and Blue hosted the Lehigh Engineers (2-9) two weekends ago in what could have been a very controversial game. In a contest which was dominated by the home team, yet remained scoreless through regulation, Bucknell again found it difficult to put the ball into the goal. Coach Heather Lewis showed signs of frustration, which she often took out on the referee. At one point during the match she turned to a fan who was wearing black and white and said, "You could do better than her [the referee]—you've got the right colors on!"

As time wound down at the end of the second half, the game appeared to be headed for overtime until the Bison scored what the officials called the winning goal as time expired. The Lehigh coach erupted in disapproval, claiming that time had run out, and a long argument ensued between the coaches and referees.

Their heated conference did little to alleviate the dilemma, however, since the timekeeper failed to count down the final seconds for the referee.

"The timer got caught up in the excitement and forgot," said Lewis. "I think we scored before time expired, and some Lehigh parents thought so too." Since her argument was getting nowhere, Lewis told the referees that Bucknell would consent to playing overtime.

"In all fairness to Lehigh and since it was our responsibility to inform the refs about the time, I agreed to play," the coach said later. "I told my kids to go out and win the game in regulation, and that way nobody will question the fact that we won."

Bucknell did just that. With 7:57 remaining in the overtime period, Elizabeth Goodall '96 scored the winning goal to give the Bison the victory—again.

Last Wednesday the team boarded a plane for five-day, three-game road trip to California to play Pacific University, Stanford, and Cal-Berkeley.

The Bison also enjoyed a fall break of their own. "We did everything a tourist could do in five days," said coach Lewis. "We swam in the Pacific, toured San Francisco, experienced San Francisco fog first-hand, went shopping, and went to Alcatraz."

They also played field hockey. Beginning with Pacific on Saturday, the Bison got another overtime victory off of the stick of Sally Keith '96 and an assist by Sue Wells '93. While the Bison may have been accustomed to playing in overtime, though, they were not used to playing in 95-degree weather.

The squad eventually did overcome the heat—as well as a 1-0 deficit—when Patricia Way '95 highlighted an impressive personal performance with a goal to tie the score and force Bucknell's fourth overtime of the season. Six minutes into the extra period, Keith scored her goal to give the Bison their second win in a row.

The next day, the team jumped right back into things with a game against Stanford University. The game remained without a goal throughout regulation and overtime as the two teams battled to a 0-0 tie. Danielle Ward '93 played 100 minutes of spectacular goalkeeping to shut down th Cardinals.

"She [Ward] played the best complete game I've seen of a goalkeeper this year," said Lewis. "We're never happy with a tie, but given the circumstances, they competed hard."

Bucknell ended the week with a 2-0 loss to Cal-Berkeley in a game that none of the Bison wished to comment about. Suffice to

Krohn explains budget dilemna

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Greg Krohn, associate professor of economics, discussed the economic and political ramifications of the federal budget deficit in a lecture entitled "Recession, Economic Growth: Bush, Clinton, Perot." held hursday in Vaughan Lit Auditorium. Rather than take a partisan approach to the problem, Krohn said that he wanted to "lay out the issues so that people can understand the dilemma."

The Dynamics of the Budget Deficit and the Economy

According to Krohn, the federal budget deficit impacts negatively upon the economy because such high deficits are associated with a lower rate of savings for the economy as a whole. Deficits push down the rate of saving since they represent a public dissaving. Krohn said that deficits are linked with the health of the economy to the extent that "gains in saving provide the capital needed to increase investment."

As it stands now, said Krohn, "the problem shows no signs of going away on its own." Most estimates assume that economic recovery will help to push deficits down until 1995, but that there are still underlying structural concerns that will push deficits back up in the late 1990's.

Amid the backdrop of probable deficit increases without substantial change in policy, Krohn weighed the benefits and costs of deficit reduction. Krohn said that while "increased investment will raise the level of productivity and national income, it will not permanently increase the rate of growth in the economy."

Furthermore, Krohn said that "the benefits (of deficit reduction) come at a cost." Among such costs, Krohn noted that "spending cuts and tax increases used to reduce the deficit would cause spending on goods and services to decrease which would result in falling income and higher unemployment in the near term..." Therefore, according to Krohn, "It is not a good idea to undertake methods to reduce the budget deficit when unemployment is high and growth is low," as they are now.

Accordingly, Krohn said that any deficit reduction plans must be assessed by two criteria: timing and speed. While Krohn said that "this recession has not been as bad as the one in 1981-1982we are still in the midst of a slow recovery." Therefore, said Krohn, it is not a good time... to begin a large scale deficit reduction program."

BUSH

Bush's deficit reduction plans, as outlined in his Fiscal Year 1993 Budget Proposal submitted to Congress in January of 1992, fall into two major categories said Krohn: tax initiative, and spending cuts.

The Bush plan provided individual tax breaks in the form of less tax withholding, and a tax break for first time home buyers. Furthermore, said Krohn, the plan called for "flexible individual retirement accounts (IRAs)" in which the holder could make "penalty-free withdrawals for certain purposes, for example medical bills and paying for (a relative's) college." The Bush plan also included a capital gains tax cut, and a 20% credit for research and experiment spending.

The "Agenda for American Renewal" outlines more economic programs of the Bush campaign. This, proposal, said Krohn, is "not specific on how it's going to achieve the limits on the growth of Medicare and Medicaid." Either costs would have to be lowered, or services would be decreased.

Krohn referred to problems in interpreting "unspecified spending cuts" within the plan. "The budget deficit under the 'Plan for American Renewal' would likely be higher if he's not able to get the unspecified spending cuts." Krohn said that overall, the plan is not likely to have any great effect on deficits either way.

CLINTON

"Unlike Bush, Clinton is calling for tax increases for foreign corporations and people with high incomes,"

Rash of thefts sweeps campus over weekend

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Marts Hall and the Olin Science building were victimized by forced entry and burglary last weekend. A total of nearly $23,000 in computer equipment has been discovered missing. Public Safety and East Buffalo Police Department are continuing their investigation into the matter.

The first break in occurred sometime between 6:30 p.m. Friday, October 16 and noon on Saturday, October 17, when the theft was discovered and reported. The math department on the third floor of the Olin Science building was where the burglars struck first.

Two math professors reported to Public Safety on Saturday afternoon that one keyboard and one MacIntosh computer were missing from their offices. Both rooms were locked and had no signs of forced entry.

Further investigation by Public Safety and the East Buffalo Police Department revealed that an unknown person(s) removed three keyboards and three computers from other offices. One set of a keyboard and computer was attained by cutting a cable lock.

The unknown person(s) also removed a key from Professor Rose Abrahamson's desk from an unlocked desk drawer, proceeded to Abrahamson's desk and removed two key rings which fit all the rooms in that department. Two more computers and a keyboard were also found to be missing.

The investigation also showed that the intruder(s) apparently tried to use a screwdriver to gain entry into the office with the key for Abrahamson's desk, but the jimmy marks on the door were not sufficient enough for police to believe it was forced open. No damage was done to the door's lock or strike plate, which may mean that the door might have been left unlocked or someone might have a key to it. The series of thefts might not have occurred unless the intruder first gained access to this office.

The key system was changed for the third floor, and the area was dusted for latent fingerprints.

Public Safety's job was not done for the weekend, however, as they received another report of forced entry at 9:20 a.m. on Sunday morning. The interior division door between Vaughan Literature building and Marts Hall showed what appeared to be fresh pry marks. Each floor of the building was investigated.

The intruder(s) apparently tried to gain entry to the Treasurer's Office, as evidenced by tool markings on the office door. Desk drawers in the office were rummaged through by the perpetrator, but nothing appeared to have been damaged or missing. This room was also dusted for latent fingerprints.

Police also discovered that the Dean's office of the College of Arts and Sciences was broken into. The lower right window of the paneled door had been broken, and the intruder gained entry by reaching in and opening the door. Investigation revealed that two secretariat's desks had been entered and a mouse and keyboard was taken from each desk. Entry was not gained into the interior offices of the room. The room was dusted and prints were obtained.

Further investigation revealed that fresh pry marks also appeared on a door to the Post Office in the basement of Marts Hall. It did not appear that the perpetrators were able to gain entry.

Princeton Review Guide rates Bucknell

Newly released guidebook presents the student perspective on 245 colleges

BY ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The recently published Princeton Review Student Access Guide to the Best Colleges ranked 245 colleges throughout the nation and rated Bucknell as first in "Lots of hard liquor" and third in "Lots of beer".

The Princeton Review is a New York based publisher of test guides; the results were obtained by interviewing students on campus and asking them to fill out questionnaires consisting of sixty-seven multiple choice questions and a comments section for the students to rate several aspects of college life.

The results were presented in several wide-ranging categories including "Party schools," "Go Greek," "Lots of sex," "Diverse student body" and "Trapped on campus." More than 100 Bucknell students responded to the survey.

The guide is designed to give potential applicants a student perspective before they make their final decisions.

According to the survey, life at Bucknell, as well as such schools at Lehigh and Lafayette is highly influenced by alcohol. In the body of the review, one student is quoted as saying "I know it's the state law, but without drinking there's no social life here."

Reactions to the accusations were mixed. Dick Skelton, Dean of Enrollment Planning stated "There aren't any surprises here," although he did emphasize the fact that the University ranks high in several more positive categories such as "Great libraries," "Students hit their books," and "Happy students." Skelton does not forsee a decline in applications or enrollment due to this publication. He said that guides such as this one have an "initial splash effect," but very rarely drastically alter the public perception of the University.

However, Barbara Shailor, Vice President for Student Services, said that Bucknell's ranking in the Princeton Review could have an effect on admissions. "It would be a concern for a parent to see the ranking for alcohol" said Shailor who stressed that the rankings should be considered as a health and social issues, and not solely from an admissions viewpoint.

According to Shailor, college guides are troubling because they concentrate on the negative and don't show many of the opportunities offered by the University such as the study abroad program, undergraduate research, and assistance programs such as the race and gender resource center, the women's resource center, and the multicultural center.

"We have great facilities, we have great faculty, and we have great students," said Shailor who pointed out that there is no mention of these factors in the guide. She stated that there are numerous other things that the University takes pride in that just aren't included in most college guides.

According to Ed Dadez, associate dean of student life, drinking is not the only social possibility. "There are many other activities that occur through the O.S.A. and Residential life," said Dadez. Dadez stressed that prospective students need to balance the pros and cons of social options and decide for themselves.

Student reactions were mixed. Kristy Schiano '95 felt that the negative representations of Bucknell were unfair and somewhat inaccurate. Tracy West '94, however, felt that there was some truth to the accusations made in the guide. "It's something that should be taken seriously," said West "It's likely to turn away potential students and/or their parents...this is something that cannot be ignored."

Skelton said that the administration does not need to mount a counter-offensive, and that if students strongly object to the review they should be the ones to respond.

Sununu stresses need for those with technical background in public sector

BY DAVID BARRY AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Former White House Chief of Staff, John Sununu, delivered the O.V.W. Hawkins Lecture entitled The Role of Engineers and Scientists in Politics and Government, on Sunday in the Weis Center. His lecture, presented to a crowd of 500, addressed a need for individuals in technical professions to enter the political arena.

In addition to his position as White House Chief of Staff, Sununu has served as governor of New Hampshire for three terms. Prior to beginning his political career, he worked as both a practicing engineer and as a professor of engineering.

Sununu received a doctorate in Mechanical Engineering at M.I.T. and served as a professor of mechanical engineering and associate dean of the college of engineering at Tufts University. He is currently co-host of CNN's Crossfire.

Sununu focused on the necessity to have what he described as "technically oriented individuals" take on a greater role in political decision making.

"One big problem in Washington is that we have laws being made by people who can't understand the difference between a part per million and a part per billion," said Sununu. He characterized this kind of lack of quantitative and analytical understanding as a major factor in many poor policy-creating decisions.

According to Sununu, the technical background of engineers and scientists can bring to Washington the critical thinking skills that are lacking among politicians.

"The most important thing that we bring is the capacity to be critical and ask questions," said Sununu. "Those professions that have a responsibility to find solutions to real life problems have to become more a part of the political process," said Sununu.

Sununu stressed during his Sunday night speech that if one sets a goal it is not sufficient to put together a set of plans to get there. "You must know where you are starting." He said that a major problem with today's policy-makers is that they talk of where we are going, but not where we are coming from.

Sununu said that this increasing need for politicians with technical skills is in line with the ever increasing complexity of the modern age. According to Sununu, politicians today must deal with "issues that have a significant technical component." He described the technical process as "a driving force in the decision making process" and said that the education and training received by engineers and scientists allow them to "make decisions based on fact, not on legend and myth."

Sununu described his own career "not as a route that is either better or worse than others but merely a route that tells how things can happen to someone involved in public service."

He stressed the importance of the fact that technical people who enter the political world are later able to re-enter their profession.

"Become part of the real world first and then go into public service," urged Sununu. "Do it in such a way that you are able to return to the real world. You want to end up dying old engineers and scientists, not old politicians," said Sununu.

Students displayed mixed reactions to Sununu's lecture. "I thought the speech was fantastic," said Jeff Dinard '93. "It was a call to arms for all students to become more involved in their country."

Not all students, however, felt so positive about Bucknell's choice of speakers. "Sununu is a corrupt official and he is not a suitable role model for Bucknell students," said Amanda Swarr '94, a member of Bucknellians Against Apathy (B.A.A), an informal campus group.

Prior to Sununu's lecture, B.A.A. distributed flyers composed of clips from the The New York Times describing Sununu's use of government funds for personal business. According to B.A.A member Joel Wainwright '95, in addition to simply passing out the material, the group also explained their views to people interested in the flyer.

Inaugurated in 1969, the Hawkins lecture honors O.V.W. Hawkins, a 1914 graduate of Bucknell who served as a member of the Board of Trustees for almost a quarter century.

The Hawkins lectureship was established to bring to campus individuals of national prominence to present a lecture on a topic of current interest.

of theft," but he hopes that no one would be intimidated by this isolated and unfortunate incident. Public Safety will examine and/or upgrade the status of their physical hardware (locks and anchors), increase their patrols of the campus and will now check the inside of locked buildings as well as the outer entrances, but Decerchio thinks that "for the most part, we need to conduct business as usual."

"Bucknell is not a location where we want to create an armed camp," he said. "This is an open community that still has to be accessible to students." He feels that bolting down or anchoring all campus equipment and locking up all buildings will create an atmosphere that defeats the purpose of the community.

The thefts "point up the fact that we are vulnerable," said Barry Maxwell, Vice President for Administration. He said that although it is easy to think that Bucknell is immune to such crime, the campus, in reality, is not immune. "Our best defense is the 4,200 people we have on campus being suspicious to such activity," he said.

Because of Bucknell's open community atmosphere, Maxwell believes that the campus is indeed vulnerable to someone committed to stealing equipment, as this intruder seemed to be. "We can minimize that happening by taking the proper precautions," Maxwell said, such as keeping doors, windows, and file cabinets locked as well as being constantly aware of suspicious activity.

Decerchio is asking that anyone who noticed any recent suspicious activity should report their observances to Sergeant Jim Middleton. The caller does not need to reveal his name, but confidentiality will be observed. The person(s) who committed the crime, Decerchio said, must have used flashlights. Any students, faculty or staff near Olin or Marts on Friday or Saturday night or in the early morning hours may have observed suspicious persons in those areas. "Anyone with any information," Decerchio asked, "please let us know."

Maxwell hopes that since the campus has become aware of the burglary, someone will remember something out of the ordinary that happened that weekend. "They may not have thought it was suspicious at the time," he said, "but we are hoping that now they may realize that their information may be useful the investigation."

Serial numbers of the stolen equipment is being published. If anyone attempts to sell equipment to someone on campus, that person should notify Public Safety immediately.

DeCherchio also offered safety tips for secretaries, faculty and students to observe:

Do not leave money, valuables, master keys of office keys in an office overnight unless they are locked in a safe.

Computers should be locked down and secured by cable to a piece of furniture.

Departments should make back-up disks for all sensitive or necessary information, which should then be locked away. It is important to keep such data on a separate disk, not on the hard drive.

Do not leave any valuable belongings where they are easily accessible. Lock doors.

Report any suspicious activity to Public Safety.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, October 15

Student reported to Officers that sometime between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. on October 14, unknown person(s) did remove a money bag and its contents from her coat, which was left unattended in a classroom in Coleman Hall.

Friday, October 16

Officers responded to Kress Hall for a student suffering severe back pain. Due to his condition an ambulance was dispatched to transport him to Evangelical ER for treatment.

Public Safety received a report of harassment from Hunt Hall. Two men had been in the building and verbally harassed several women. When stopped outside by Officers, the men appeared to be under the influence of alcohol and had beer in possession. Both were identified and transported back to their residence hall. Both were underage.

Officers observed a student break a window in the D-wing section of Swartz Hall, by striking it with a bike pump. Student also appeared to be under the influence of alcohol, and was under the legal drinking age.

Officers responded to Hunt Hall for a reported individual refusing to leave the building. On arrival officers found a male under the influence of alcohol, being verbally and physically abusive towards officers in their attempt to contain him. Lewisburg PD was summoned and cited the individual for disorderly conduct and underage consumption.

Saturday, October 17

Officers responded to Kappa Delta Rho fraternity for an information report relating to a larceny. Brothers of the house did find two unauthorized males in the house removing boxes of food from the kitchen area. Individuals were identified as students and the matter is being handled internally.

Sunday, October 18

Student sustained an ankle injury when she fell down some stairs in Smith Hall. The injured student was transported to Evangelical emergency room by the Student Health Service for treatment.

A Langone Center custodian reported damage to an overturned picnic table and a large trash can outside the downhill side of the building.

Unknown person(s) did enter an unlocked residence room in Vedder Hall and removed cash and Bucknell identification card from student's wallet. The theft occurred sometime between 8 p.m. and 10 p.m. on October 17.

Public Safety officers observed an individual not affiliated with Bucknell removing aluminum cans from the recycling bin near the Library. The subject was detained and also had in his possession bags of cans obtained at the Bucknell West recycling bins. East Buffalo Police Department was contacted and advised of the situation; they will charge the individual.

Monday, October 19

Two residents of Vedder Hall reported that items valued at approximately $450.00 were removed from their rooms. There were no signs of forced entry to either of the rooms where the theft occurred. Investigation is continuing.

The East Buffalo Police Department informed Public Safety of an unsecured bicycle that was found near the Music and Arts building. The owner may identify and claim the bicycle at the Public Safety office. The bike is registered with the Lewisburg Police Department.

A resident of Phi Kappa Psi fraternity reported that he was the victim of harassing and annoying telephone calls. He said that the calls have been an ongoing occurrence this past semester.

Tuesday, October 20

The service man for Service America Vending Company reported the theft of approximately $20.00 worth of goods from a vending machine in Swartz Hall. The theft occurred sometime between 10:30 a.m. on October 16 and 9:30 a.m. on October 20.

A Physical Plant custodian reported than a vacuum cleaner valued at $475.00 was removed from the basement of the Carnegie Building. The theft occurred sometime between 8 and 11 a.m. on this date.

A student reported the theft of his wallet from the third floor of the Langone Center. The student left his wallet in his jacket outside the restroom facility, and upon returning moments later discovered the theft of his wallet and its contents.

Thursday, October 22

Public Safety was notified of a dumpster fire on Fraternity Road near Sigma Chi fraternity. It is currently unknown of surrounding circumstances or the person(s) responsible.

Officers responded to Vedder Hall on the report of an intoxicated student who was acting very abusive toward her roommates and other members of the hall. •Victim was coherent, although in a combative state.

Studies abroad Fair held in Bison

BY LAURA HINSMAN AND JESSICA SKLUTE

The Off-Campus Studies Fair, held in the Bison on Tuesday, October 20th between 9:30 and 11:00 p.m., attracted many students interested in future study overseas.

According to Doug Poskitt '93, a Bison Abroad member and a coordinator of the fair, 70 seniors who have previously studied abroad attended the fair, representing 22 countries and 54 study abroad programs.

The program was co-organized by interns Jen Scheib '93 and David Soll '93 under the guidance of Susan Zingale-Baird of the International Studies Office, and Bison Abroad, a group of Bucknell students who have recently returned from studying abroad.

The fair was intended specifically for first and second year students still in the initial stages of study abroad planning.

Coordinators of the fair also hoped to increase awareness and arouse interest in the possibility of international studies for those who had not previously considered a semester overseas.

"I felt that the fair was a big success," said Schieb. "It went very well and the turnout was impressive."

The event offered students access to literature describing various study abroad programs in order to help them determine which best suits their individual study abroad needs.

In addition to this information, the students received insight and advice from those who have previously studied with these programs through one on one conversation and personal photo albums of their travels.

Last year the fair was held in the Vedder "Red Room." A participant in both last year's and this year's fair, Heather Brice '93 commented that this year's fair, held in the Bison, was more successful and exciting. A new addition to this year's fair was a film capturing scenes from "Bucknell en France," which added to the evening's international atmospere.

Scheib agreed that the change in location was an improvement to the event. "I think having it in the Bison made students aware of what was going on."

According to Poskitt, the overall success of this year's Off-Campus Studies Fair can be especially attributed to the enthusiasm of returning students to share their study abroad experiences.

Poskitt said that the fair had much to offer. "Seniors have a wealth of knowlege to pass on about living, studying, and traveling abroad," he said.

said Krohn. Furthermore, the spending proposals of the candidates differ since Clinton proposes "increased spending on public infrastructure and further cuts in defense spending." According to Krohn, Clinton's plan for the health care dilemma is to put "spending caps on health care and phase in universal access to Medicare care through employer and public programs."

Clinton's plan also has its weaknesses said Krohn. Specifically, he objected to a proposal that would require 1.5% of an employer's payroll to be spent on educating and training its workers since it will increase employers' costs. Furthermore, Krohn referred to spending cuts "under the category of administrative/managerial cost reductions" which raises the "question of whether they can be realized."

PEROT

The essence of the Perot campaign is deficit reduction. Perot's platform includes many measures aimed at increasing government revenue accord: large increases in the gasoline and tobacco tax, a 33% top tax bracket, eliminating mortgage deductions on second homes, higher taxes on social security benefits, lifting the cap on income subject to Medicare taxes.

Perot's spending decreases include agriculture subsidies, Medicare and Medicaid, and certain discretionary programs coupled with across the board cuts for all discretionary programs.

Perot also has programs intended to expand the economy. According to Krohn, Perot proposes a tax credit for investment and research and development (R and D), and reduced taxes on long term capital gains and elimination of capital gains taxes for small businesses.

However, the program for expansion would be like a drop in the bucket compared to the lost consumption that would occur under Perot. "My big concern," said Krohn, "is for his plan not to cause an increase in unemployment, there would have to be an expansionary monetary policy (i.e. a decrease in interest rates) to get investment and exports to replace lost consumption." However, governmental control of the money supply is under the sole jurisdiction of the Federal Reserve, which has other goals such as price stability that make it "doubtful whether the Fed would keep interest rates low enough." Again, the factors of timing and speed enter in to the extent that, according to Krohn, Perot's plan has no hope of being effective without a period of substantial economic growth preceding its implementation.

Krohn returned to Bush and Clinton and said "Neither of them have very ambitious deficit reduction plans." Krohn did say that "because Clinton has more public capital expenditures, it does come out better in terms of the rate of capital formation (and therefore investment) that will result."

The optimum solution, according to Krohn, would be a plan that included tax incentives for R and D (something which each of the candidates favors), increasing the gas tax by half of Perot's proposed levels, increasing taxes on the top income bracket and eliminating deductions for second homes, as well as increasing spending on the public infrastructure.

1992 Alcohol Awareness Activities

Bucknell's Alcohol Awareness week is October 26-30. Each day, from 11a.m.-1p.m., there will be a table in the LC Mall with information of different issues surrounding alcohol. Also, each day will feature a video.

So, what do all those guide books say?

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Insider's guides to college campuses brag about providing a unique opportunity for prospective students to discover the "ins and outs" of a college. Over the years, Bucknell has received mixed reviews from such in-depth, investigative college guide books. Students have commented on what is best about Bucknell ("the educational opportunity-the teachers are great, and if you want to, you can learn a lot") and also what is worst ("general apathy about social and world issues, homogeneity, and social nothingness").

The Fiske Guide to college campuses, for example, examines both the benefits and the problems associated with universities around the country. The guide opens its critique of Bucknell with "Students at Bucknell are the academic embodiment of what Tom Wolfe might have called the 'We Generation.' They take pride in their clean-cut, all-American image and their traditional values." It also points out, however, that "the wardrobes on this campus could be sold to pay off a major portion of the national deficit" and "according to a popular t-shirt, number one of the top ten reasons to go to Bucknell is, 'WHAT ELSE WOULD I DO WITH $80,000?' "

Observances such as these could significantly influence a perspective student's decision to apply for admission. "I think all guide books can affect admissions," said Vice President for Student Services Barbara Shallor. "It may deter people from applying who we would normally like to have apply."

Nonetheless, the positive assessments may also strongly influence students to further investigate the campus and its students for him or herself. An optimistic review offered by these books may initiate an interest in Bucknell that a perspective student may not have previously had.

Generally, professors are said to be dedicated, able, and accessible.
— The Insider's Guide to the Colleges 1992

Most of the information in insider's guides are obtained from an outside, objective investigator who visits the campus and talks mainly to students, and sometimes to administration and faculty. The purpose of the reviews is to give incoming students an angle on the campus that they could not get from standard, computerized data and statistics.

The guides generally examine the academic programs first, and even procede as far as listing "Recommended Courses" (Management 101 and "Any Geography course with Richard Peterec") and "Most popular 'Blow-Off' Courses" (General Biology and any introductory Dance class). According to the books, engineering and the natural science departments are considered to have the strongest and most demanding curriculum, while economics, biology and management are the most popular college majors.

By contrast, the foreign language and sociology departments are considered weak, and the English department also garners complaints such as "the English classes should be chosen carefully according to who is teaching the class."

On a scale of ten, students rated Bucknell's overall academic excellence an eight, its sincere interest in undergraduate students a nine, and the facilities and physical plant a nine.

The faculty and administration were generally viewed as strong points of the community. "Professors are said to be dedicated, able and accessible. It is easy to see that professors here are genuinely concerned about their students," wrote one reviewer. Another commented that it is "not uncommon" to see faculty and even the President having coffee or dinner with students, or to find "faculty and students playing tennis or basketball together."

The investigative trend tackles the social arena next. The Greek system attracts the most attention in this category, although much of the criticism is negative. One student commented, for example, that "a lot of the sorority women are stuck up and unless you are the son of the president of a big company and in one of the 'cool' fraternities, they won't give you the time of day." Nonetheless, listed as a favorite school tradition is House Party Weekend: "A Greek-wide three day/three night fun-filled (dare I say 'party') weekend."

The homogeneity of the campus was listed as the consistent draw back. Reports include "Homosexuals on campus keep a low profile. It is very closed-mouthed because people here are not very accepting" and "the minority situation is very segregated, and there is lots of tension."

The Birnbach adds another dimension to its reviews by listing the universitiy's distinguished alumni. Acknowledged in Bucknell's list are Ben Benson, restaurateur and founder of "T.G.I. Friday's"; George Young, general manager of the New York Giants; and Ken Langone, business manager for Ross Perot.

Overall, Bucknell has managed to maintain its respectable reputation as a strong academic institution. But it has also maintained its reputation as a homogeneous, conservative, politically correct, relatively heavy "party school."

The final paragraph of the Fiske Guide reads, "Bucknell is probably not the right place for 'a free-floating spirit seeking inner discovery,' and while most students tend to view this as a virtue of the school, a few note the drawbacks. 'It's called the Bucknell Bubble because students are catered to in a gorgeous setting with great facilities and are unaware of what goes on in the world.' Things could be worse."

Harassment charge filed against student

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Harassment charges have been filed against Anthony Doyle '96, by another Bucknell student as the result of an incident that occurred on September, 17.

According to the police report, Doyle allegedly "walked up to the victim and struck him in the face with a fist. The victim suffered a loose tooth and bloody mouth. The incident took place at a party held at an apartment on St. Catherine Street at approximately 1:30 a.m.

As stated in the police report, "the victim and his friends followed the attacker and his friends to Larison Hall," following the incident at the apartment. "Once there, words led to shoves and punches." At this time, Public Safety officers were called to the scene.

According to Hall Solomon, district justice of Luzerne county "a harassment charge is a summary offence that can result in a fine of up to $300.00, up to ninety days in jail or a combination of both." Solomon noted that Doyle does have the right to "have a hearing before the district justice and be represented by an attorney."

News Briefs

On Campus

Jean Kilbourne to speak

Jean Kilbourne will give two slide presentations examining media images of women and the connection between alcohol and advertising on Monday, Oct. 26.

The first, "Eating Our Hears Out: The Obsession With Thinness" will be held at noon in the Langone Center Forum.

The second, "Under the Influence: The Pushing of Alcohol Via Advertising" begins at 7:30 p.m. in the Weis Center. This lecture examines how advertising links success and happiness with the use of alcohol.

Acapella group to perform

The internationally acclaimed female acapella group, Sweet Honey in the Rock, will perform at the Weis Center on November 8th. The group has a unique style rooted in black church, blues, jazz, and African music.

Jeans Day

Jeans Day is an opportunity for members of the University community to show their support for the rights of gays, lesbians and bisexuals. This semester's Jeans Day will be held Friday, October 30.

Jeans Day is sponsored by FLAG & B (Friends of Lesbians, Gays and Bisexuals).

More information will be available at tables in the Langone Center Mall.

Confronting sexual harassment

Bucknell's Sexual Harassment Task Force and the Women's Resource Center will be hosting a live interactive national teleconference entitled "Confronting Sexual Harassment on Campus." The National Association of Student Personnel Administrators is organizing the event, which will be broadcast from 1:30-3:30 p.m. on Thursday, November 12th in the Langone Center Forum.

A year after the Clarance Thomas/Anita Hill hearings, sexual harassment remains an important topic on college campuses.

The Supreme Court has ruled that schools may be held liable to sexually harassed students for damages based on sex discrimination claims.

Mid-term writing referrals

Faculty can formally alert students that their writing is unsatisfactory by issuing a mid-term writing referral.

Professors indicate the deficiency on the student's mid-term grade report. The student will then receive a letter from the Writing Center that encourages consultation with the instructor and invites them to visit the Center.

Early acknowledgement of a writing deficiency identifies the problem and can prevent further difficulties. Students can cooperate with both their instructor and Writing Center tutors to improve their skills.

Off Campus

Students graduate 50 years late

More than one hundred Japanese-American students graduated this fall from the University of California at Berkeley campus who were scheduled to graduate fifty years ago.

The students were seniors at Berkeley in 1942 and were among the thousands of Japanese-Americans interned during World War II, causing them to miss their graduation exercises.

As part of the special ceremony, the students wore leis composed of miniature figures of the tsuru, a stork that symbolizes life, prospocerity and happiness in the Japanese tradition.

Forum addresses issues of sexuality

An alumni of Williams College in Massachusettes has established a campus fund for human sexuality and diversity to help students deal with their own sexuality and the sexual diversity they face each day.

Michael Dively '61 established the fund to provide an ongoing series of lectures and other vehicles to raise such issues of sexuality and diversity as celibacy, femininity, masculinity, sexual abuse and incest.

The Dively Fund currently contains $75,000 and will help bring to the surface issues that Dively feels have been under cover at Williams for too long.

Women and the Citadel

The Citadel, a state-run military institution in Charleston, South Carolina, has received a challenge to its policy against admitting women.

The school closed its day-school program for military veterans rather than admit female veterans who sued to gain access to the classes.

In response, the American Civil Liberites Union has petitioned a federal court to keep the day program and admit women. "The school would rather be dead than co-ed," said Isabelle Katz Pinzler, director of the ACLU women's rights project.

No decision has been made yet by federal officials.

Graduation fee assessed

Members of Clarion University's Class of 1993 will be assessed a $15 graduation fee. The fee will cover the cost of graduation expenses, which includes diploma jackets, postage to send out the diplomas, the commencement program, possible speakers and ticket expenses.

The fee will generate approximately $5,500 annually to help lessen the financial burden of graduation.

Clarion is now one of eleven of the fourteen state universities that charge this fee.

Support group helps abroad students readjust

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Are you feeling a loss of freedom as you return to your Bucknell schedule—missing time to think, to question, to live? Do you feel that Bucknell does not recognize or help you to utilize your experiences? If you went abroad and answered yes to any of these questions, think about sharing your re-entry shock of returning to Bucknell with trained peer counselors and other students who are facing the same difficulties.

The Office of International Education has coordinated a group of peer counselors, students who have returned from an off-campus experience, to help other students who have gone abroad cope with the trauma of returning from their abroad experience. The peer counselors, Tina Cannon '93, Nina Knoche '93, Suzi Merselis '93, and Deb Spitzer '93, were trained on the subject of reverse culture shock through personal experiences and a mini-retreat headed by Susan Zingale-Baird, International Student and Study Abroad Advisor, and Rosaria Gabriele, associate director of Psychological Services.

The new peer counselors have taken a different approach to organizing the group by making the meetings less "workshop-ish," Zingale-Baird said, and leaning toward a more support-session atmosphere, where the meeting is an open forum of discussion. Some students don't like the idea of "group therapy," Zingale-Baird said, but the peer counselors are there to talk, not tell the students what is wrong with them.

Reverse culture shock occurs when a student who has gone abroad returns to find that not only has nothing changed at school, but the school and more specifically the student's friends are not receptive to the new changes in the old student. Tina Cannon '93, noting the difficulty in this re-entry into the Bucknell community, said, "Returning students find that they cannot deflate their new experiences from abroad to fit into their normal culture anymore. The shock comes when the student finally realizes that they are not the same anymore, and their friends are treating them as the old person, instead of adapting to the new."

Can you relate?
* Experiencing grief, separation and loss of friends, host family, way of life, and familar environment.
* Inability to communicate your experience to family and friends.
* Alienation—a concept of self that is very different from your peers. A feeling that you are "out of place."

The reasons for the re-entry shock stem from an overall conformist attitude that Bucknell promotes, said Cannon. "Alternative behavior is not acceptable at Bucknell because the system is so structured and similar. That is when returning students begin to struggle with themselves. They are caught between appeasing their friends pushing for the conformist, and satisfying their own desire to be an individual," Cannon said.

The role of the peer counselor is to help returning students understand that the difficulties that they are going through are not unique or impossible to get over, said Nina Knoche '93. "We let them know that the lines of communication are open, so if they need help readjusting, they can talk to a counselor or a support group," Knoche said. Although peer counselor is the official title given to the four students heading the organization, it is not a completely appropriate title, said Cannon. "We don't like being called counselors because it gives students the idea that there is something wrong with them and they need counseling," Cannon said. "I don't look at what we do as counseling. I see it more as a support group for people who are sharing a common readjustment problem."

Because not all students returning from their abroad experience have difficulty readjusting, the peer counselors try to zero in on those who are having troubles. "Our group is targeting the students who are struggling with being back in the normal routine of campus life. These are the people that might need some support to let them know that their feelings against friends or Bucknell are not unusual," said Cannon.

With the increasing number of organizations on campus that cater to publicizing the abroad experience, some students are confused with what each group has to offer them. The peer counselors provide an atmosphere unlike any of the other organizations for abroad students because the emotional aspect of the experience is the focus of the support group. "We take dealing with the abroad experience a step deeper by talking about problems with adjusting and communicating with old friends, and not just what they did and how much fun they had. We make sure that the students are really o.k. with Bucknell, the new attitudes and the problems they are facing."

The idea for the peer counseling came last year, Zingale-Baird said, from a student intern who wanted to offer students who have been abroad the opportunity to vent their frustrations about their return. Though the initial effort to organize a group failed, the idea sparked some interest which rekindled the group again this year. Although the new effort to re-organize the group has had a slow start, interest was shown in the peer counseling groups. "We know the struggling students are out there," said Cannon. "It is just a matter of finding them and letting them know that someone is here to talk to."

Have you ever wondered what the "Potato Chip" is?

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

The "Potato Chip" is a cement sculpture created by Donald Yurdin in 1968. Its symbolic meaning is unknown.

BY CHRIS GUBITOSE AND NANCY NORBECK

Every Bucknellian knows about the potato chip sculpture near the Music and Arts building, but most people don't know what it symbolizes or when the sculpture was placed there.

According to William Lasansky, professor of art, the sculpture, which is made of reinforced concrete steel and hollow inside, was produced in 1968 by Donald Ira Yurdin, a senior mathematics major. In the first semester a plaster model of the sculpture was made before it was built up to its full size.

According to Lasansky, Yurdin himself referred to the sculpture as a potato chip. There were a total of four made, which were given to the school after they were finished and placed on various spots on campus.

Lasansky was unsure about what the sculptures meant to Yurdin. However, he did say that Yurdin was trying to work out certain relationships of forms and that these sculptures were variations on a similar kind of abstract problem.

Pizza tradition at Bucknell carries on

If you're a Bucknellian, you've been to...

BY HEATHER DOHERTY

What do celebrities Drew Barrymore, Larry Hagman, and Lisa Bonet all have in common? Their pictures all appear on the walls of Vennari's Pizza on Market Street in Lewisburg.

Does this mean that famous people sometimes travel all the way to Central Pennsylvania to sample the pizza at this local restaurant? It may look that way from the numerous autographed pictures that adorn the walls in the small pizzeria, but it isn't exactly true.

It is somewhat surprising to walk into a small pizzeria in the booming metropolis of Lewisburg and see the walls covered with photographs of famous people. One could easily wonder if the place is world famous. Instead, the owners, Howard and Karen Roessler, have relatives who own a talent agency in California. When the Roessler's go to California for a visit, they often end up going out to dinner with Karen's sister, who owns the agency and the star, so collecting the autographed photos is an easy and entertaining feat.

Almost every Bucknellian has, at one time or another, relied on this local establishment to save them from a caf dinner or get them through a late-night study session. But is the fact that Vennari's makes campus-famous pizzas, subs and dinners all there is to know about this local restaurant?

For the past seven years, Vennari's has been a favorite of Bucknell students for pizza in Lewisburg. Most of their business is to the Bucknell community, and one employee of Vennari's said that if it weren't for Bucknell, they "wouldn't be in business." Special weekends at Bucknell keep things busy at Vennari's. "Parents Weekend and Homecoming Weekend are the busiest times for the restaurant," claims chef Rodney Gentzel. During this past Homecoming, Vennari's delivered 225 pizzas in an hour and a half. Much of the business was due to large orders of approximately 25 pizzas going to several fraternities.

But to the average Bucknell student, Vennari's is just a great place to go for pizza. Vennari's boasts about a pair of Bucknellians who made a weekly ritual of eating at the restaurant. Every Saturday night, for most of last year, the two showed up at Vennari's for the usual: an extra large sausage pizza and two medium cokes. By second semester, they were regulars at the place and the waitress no longer needed to take their order. It is still not clear whether they were going for the pleasure of the pizza or the attention of the waitress.

Vennari's special relationship with Bucknell is evident in its atmosphere as well. Aside from the photos of celebrities, several picture collages of Vennari's Bucknell patrons decorate the walls. Vennari's has been making the collages for a few years which have come to symbolize the strong bond that holds Bucknell and Vennari's together: pizza!

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

Catherine Hollyer '96, takes a bite out of Bucknell tradition as she munches on a Vennari's 'slice.'

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

It hasn't happened yet, but the first snow fall this semester will be here soon enough. The hefty drops in temperature the past few weeks is a constant reminder that Jack Frost will soon be nipping at more than our noses.

EDITORIAL

Students need to look inside themselves

Remember the college decision process? It was difficult, wasn't it? With all those facts and figures about school size, percentage accepted, amount of financial aid granted, and numbers of males versus females, an in-depth commentary on the social and academic climate became pleasure reading.

It's no wonder then that a new college review book appears on the bookstand each year. Filled with interesting, but often hollow questions and categorizations, they are instant moneymakers.

However, prospective students should really question whether or not to believe what these compilers of information have to say. Were students being honest on the day that they were surveyed? Could the weather have affected their mood? Were they maybe angry at a professor for assigning an overly ambitious project or were they overly elated, coming off of a hard, but exhilarating night of social frenzy?

Can their feelings about the school at that given moment be trusted? Fortunately or unfortunately, prospectives take the reviews as total truth about the schools. They may even decide to apply at a particular institution because of what they read.

Because of this, students should be careful and thoughtful when filling out such surveys. Their answers should also represent how they themselves feel, not how they think they should feel about college.

Just because some students love to party, it doesn't mean that all students like to partake of the pleasure three, sometimes even four or more nights of the week. Not all students love to drink, either. Yet, with our top ten ratings in the country (out of 245 schools) for abundance of beer and hard liquor, a prospective and his or her parents might begin to paint quite literally an outrageous picture of Bucknell. Not that some wouldn't mind it, but others...disagree.

Questions arise in other areas as well. Are our professors and administrators as good as we said they were (top twenty in the country)? Are our dorms really palaces? Are we homophobic? These books can often tell us a lot about ourselves. We, as well as the prospectives, must look at them as a form of evaluation and learn to question what they report.

If our professors are really as accessible as we would like the rest of the country to believe, then we should be thrilled and consider ourselves lucky to have chosen Bucknell. On the other hand, if our campus can be honestly classified as homophobic, then we have a problem. Appearing in a book of this sort under such a category only magnifies it, as it draws even more homogeneous people to campus, students who are just as likely as the current bunch to not accept diversity.

Books like the Princeton Review can serve as monitors for the campus community. Areas where work needs to be done, programs need to be initiated, can be easily pinpointed by reading them. Once areas of concern are noticed (in bold print no less), it can be decided whether the problem lies within the University or within the students it has attracted. Sometimes the University needs to change, but sometimes students need to change the way they perceive life and the image that they strive to present.

Professor criticizes re-calendaring coverage

TO THE EDITOR:

I write concerning your editorial on October 16th about the calendar changes.

The lesser point about it is that you are uninformed. Were you at the faculty meeting? The major reasons for the changes, as spelled out clearly in the agenda for the meeting, were not as you represented them — that we wanted to be like other schools. Why did you choose to mislead your readers? Is it so very hard for you to think of anything interesting to say about the decision? You don't seem to have any opinion at all about the calendar, but only about the fact that we considered other schools' calendars as we deliberated. (Your accusation that this constitutes plagiarism is silly, and trivializes the important issue of academic dishonesty. All ideas build upon others.)

Much more importantly, you are failing the students and the whole university by making noise about a decision only after it is too late to do anything. The Committee on Instruction (COI) sought student opinion, both formally and informally, and we would have welcomed more. We were quite open about the decision. This issue has been under discussion since last April, and I presented exactly this calendar as a suggestion at the September faculty meeting. The Bucknellian has never mentioned the issue until now.

Do you have any responsibility about how decisions are made here? Can you have involvement in the governance of the school, beyond complaining unin-formedly after the fact? Who better than The Bucknellian can foster healthful, helpful debate about important issues? Why don't you?

X country team responds to re-calendaring

TO THE EDITOR:

We, the Men's Cross Country team, are extremely concerned about the re-calendaring proposal and it's consequences. Shifting the spring semester ahead will seriously damage Bucknell's track program (as well as other spring sports) by preventing the team's participation in the Patriot League Championships.

Only recently The Bucknellian published an article showcasing the strength of Bucknell's athletic program. Bucknell has the highest graduation rate of student athletes in the nation! In addition Bucknell is second to Nebraska in the number of Academic All Americans over the past ten years. Last year alone the track team boasted two Academic All American recipients. If the new calendar schedule is implemented athletes will be denied the opportunity to excel and achieve these honors.

We believe that the sports program at Bucknell is important, not only to the athletes, but to the University itself Student athletes are an integral part of the Bucknell community, as they lead in academic excellence and epitomize the involvement of students in extra-curricular activities. Implementation of the new schedule will decrease Bucknell's ability to attract student athletes.

On a practical level, the faculty should consider shifting the spring semester by two weeks as opposed to three. This will allow spring sports to participate in their respective league championships and would rectify this conflict.

Bucknell has always been proud of its athletic programs and it's student athletes. The current re-calendaring proposal will inhibit spring sports and will directly affect the university's character and essence.

Please consider reevaluating the proposed 1993-94 calendar.

Bison Programming Comm. apologizes for comedian

TO THE EDITOR:

With rare exception, there is live entertainment in the Bison every Friday and Saturday night. It is the goal of the Bison Programming Committee (BPC) and the Bucknell Activities Committee (BAC) to provide quality, responsible entertainment whether it be comedians, bands, or some other type of novelty act. We program a variety of acts—from Fun Flicks to Santa Fe Blues; Bicycle Thieves to Sue Kolinsky—in an attempt to please a very diverse audience.

Despite the precautions we take in selecting entertainment for the Bison, BPC cannot predict how well a performer will or will not "go over" once he/she is on stage nor can we censor what a performer can or cannot say. As a result of this inability "to censor" BPC has, unintentionally and most regretfully, offended a large segment of the Bucknell Community. We would like to extend an apology to the community, especially to the members of FLAG&B who have worked and continue to work hard to create in the students, faculty, staff, and administration of Bucknell, an awareness of the reality of homosexuality and to promote the acceptance of those who are gay, lesbian, or bisexual. Their efforts to educate should be commended, NOT degraded in the name of "humor." Those who attended comedian Henry Cho (Sept. 18), sponsored by BPC, were subjected to a series of homophobic "jokes" that attacked and insulted people we work with, attend classes with, and are friends with. This is not funny.

Although BPC is sincerely sorry for both the subtle and outright insults Mr. Cho made against homosexuality, we are thankful that FLAG&B took the initiative to voice their concerns to us, as should any group or individual who has positive or negative feedback about any entertainment provided by BPC or BAC. Through this incident, BPC and FLAG&B were able to establish an open line of communication which proved far more valuable than either organization had hoped. In an intense and in depth discussion, members of BPC and FLAG&B expressed their views, thoughts, and feelings, asking questions freely and answering honestly. Together, we sought ways in which we could prevent any group—be it gay, lesbian, bisexual, or any other oppressed group—from being singled out and "poked" fun at. Realizing

Group addresses keg theory

TO THE EDITOR

The 'Street Beat' section of the October 16 issue of The Bucknellian featured the responses to the question, "What can Bucknell do to save the environment?" The suggestion was made that serving beer from kegs at parties would help; however, while aluminum cans and glass are readily recyclable, plastic cups are not. To that extent, unless the method of serving beer from kegs were to change (i.e. if everyone brought their own mug), using kegs causes more non-recyclable waste. To save the environment, Bucknell will need a coordinated, concerted effort to reduce and recycle all wastes; if you want to help, please come to one of our meetings on Mondays, at 9 PM, in Walls Lounge.

FLAG & B criticizes lack of coverage of McNaught Lecture

TO THE EDITOR:

I was shocked, angry, and a bit saddened with the lack of any pre- or Post- event coverage of Brian McNaught's lecture in the Weis Center on Tuesday, September 29th. McNaught's talk, entitled "On Being Gay In a Straight World," described the plight and problems of growing up gay in America. Despite the lack of any great publicity in The Bucknellian prior to the event, the lecture was well attended and well received as demonstrated by the standing ovation by most of the 700-plus in attendance.

I was shocked, angry, and a bit saddened with the lack of any pre- or Post- event coverage of ..."On Being Gay In a Straight World,"

It is surprising to me that a well publicized event which was co-sponsored by over 15 campus groups including funds from IFC and Panhel, New Student Orientation, Rooke Chapel, the Residential Colleges and more, did not warrant the attention of The Bucknellian—the "official" written voice of the Bucknell community.

Since the goal of this lecture was to educate Bucknell students, faculty, and staff, doesn't it seem logical that The Bucknellian should have done a bit more than publish a brief note in "Upcoming Events"? In light of this, why is there such an inconsistency in the events which do get publicized, as seen in the front page article on the John Sununu Lecture? As a member of the Bucknell community, I would like an explanation.

It is time to vote the incumbents out

"Lewisburg, 17837" — By Steve McNutt '95

BY JOHN STITH

In the next few weeks we will choose not only our next president, but senators, representatives, governors, and various state officers. These people will also have the power to cause change, or continue the gridlock of our government. But how can we make a choice in these races in which we often know nothing about the people running?

The point is to change not only the specific people, but much more importantly, the entire system.

I invite you to join a growing national movement and vote anti-incumbent this year. This means that in all those races where you don't seem to have any information, vote for giving the job to someone new.

First, I do not propose that you vote this way in a race you know something about—for most of us, that's the presidency. We can make a well-informed decision between Bush, Clinton, and Perot. But how can I make a decision on my state senator race: William J. Stewart vs. Tony Joseph? Should I vote by who has prettier signs on the side of the road, or by their affiliation to our weak political parties? No.

Most would agree with this generalization: We need new people in our government. Currently, incumbents (especially those in Congress) are extremely likely to win re-election. Thus, they have very little incentive to do anything bold and risky in solving our problems. They look at the past and see clearly that if they do the usual casework and local news appearances, they are assured of their jobs until they die. Is it surprising that these unchallenged officials aren't keeping America competitive and socially just?

The point is to change not only the specific people, but much more importantly, the entire system. If we continually "throw the bums out," our elected officials will be forced to do better, or else lose their jobs. Only the fear of losing elections will force our officials to work together. Through voting, we have the power to do this, so why don't we?

The main argument against voting anti-incumbent is that you may be voting for the less competent person.

First, while this is certainly true in a few cases, the problem is that the majority of Americans (as polls have shown) think that their representative is fine, but Congress as a whole is not. The result of this mind-set is incumbents almost always win.

Second, our perception of the two candidates is very biased. Incumbents almost always have more campaign money than their challengers. It's much easier for incumbents to raise money because they have formed ties with moneyed special interests while in office. They also have the enormous advantage of name recognition. They then use these advantages to make us believe that they're great and their opponent is not. The challenger often does not have the money to make an effective response.

Third, a specific challenger may not be as competent as a specific incumbent. But don't you feel that a group of new people could do better than the current bunch? Don't expect voters in other states and districts to create change, while you vote for your incumbent. The present situation will simply continue if we all vote for the same people.

So, make a quick call home and find out who your incumbents are. (You'll know them by their many TV appearances and commercials.) Then vote for someone new. America loves an underdog. This is a year in which our challenger underdogs must win.

Women's cross country team also responds to re-calendering

TO THE EDITOR:

It has been brought to my attention that Jan plan as we know it has been abolished and we will be done with school seven to ten days earlier starting 1993-4. On the surface, this seems to be in the students best interests. But the way the Committee on Instruction has designed finals week has not been in the best interest of the student-athletes, the track and field athletes in particular. As it stands now, Outdoor Track and Field Patriot League Championships fall on the weekend between finals exams, and Bucknell athletes will not be permitted to participate.

For those who do not follow track and field, let me fill you In on the success of our program. In the past four years, men's and women's Indoor and Outdoor Track have combined for 1 I conference titles and five second place finishes. We have had IC4A and ECAC qualifiers and scorers. Success abounds in track and field.

More importantly, Bucknell track and field athletes are outstanding in the classroom. Does the name Kelly Marsh ring a bell? She graduated as an academic all-American with a 4.0 G.P.A. How about Mathew Deardorff, Jason Cahilly, and Bob Kelly? They were just featured in a summer issue of Sports Illustrated for their athletic and academic achievements. The G.P.A. for women's and men's track and field teams are the best of all sports teams.

Ben Marsh seems to see no problems in the new academic calendar. He claims that "other frame of reference schools have encountered the same problems and have worked them out." Professor Marsh, did you attend the 1991 Outdoor Patriot League Championships at Bucknell? If you had, you would've seen very few Colgate athletes. Why? Because that was part of their finals week. Colgate hasn't dealt with the problem.

I appeal to the Vice President of Student Services Barbara Shailor and President Sojka for help. We as student-athletes work very hard to achieve the most in all we do. We train hard, and make sacrifices to bring glory to our school. If we aren't allowed to compete in the Patriot League Championships next spring, our training will be for nothing. The most talented teams in the league will be home, while the others compete. If we can't compete, doesn't that defeat the purpose of the Patriot League? On behalf of women's track and field, I ask that the finals week schedule be redesigned to accommodate our championship meet.

Character is the issue of this presidential election

BY ANDREW COHEN

George Bush has attempted to make character into a campaign issue in the Presidential election. He is right to do so. In fact, Bush does not take the character issue far enough. In this election, more so than any other in my short electoral memory, for whom you vote reveals more about you than the candidates. The very framework of your value system is on the line in this election. But character is only an issue because the distinction between the two major party candidates is so clear.

There is a Nitzschean chasm that separates the respective value systems of Bush and Clinton. Clinton's approach is one that subscribes to a good/bad value distinction where the focus is on the superiority of his positions, and in which those of his opponents are not treated with scorn or resentment, but simply as bad positions, not as good as his. Bush also sees himself as good, but his focus is on Clinton, whom he treats as evil.

The very framework of your value system is on the line in this election. But character is only an issue because the distinction between the two major party candidates is so clear.

The distinction is imperative in understanding what is going on in the campaign. It distinguishes the Vietnam war protestors who fought for peace from Joseph McCarthy who fought against communism. In the final analysis one is forced to choose between love and hate: Clinton's love of what he sees as good, and Bush's hatred of what he sees as evil.

Clinton's focus is always on his plan and his record. He offers comparisons to Bush and explains why he thinks he is a better. When he concluded the last debate he showed respect for both of his opponents, praising Ross Perot and honoring Bush's record of service, even though he disagrees with them both. Clinton's approach is pointedly American, fighting for something in the marketplace of ideas.

Bush, on the other hand, is fighting against something, namely Clinton and everything else un-American. The respect and tolerance that characterize the free marketplace of ideas are nowhere to be found. Divide and conquer is the battle cry of the Bush campaign. Those who do not agree with Bush's positions are denigrated. If you do not agree with us, you are not American, said Pat Buchannan as well as Bush's advisers at the Republican convention.

The power that us and them appeal unleashes is devastating. We won World War II because the U.S. was able to rally against the "Japs." Germany's ability to harness hatred against "Jews and other undesirables" resulted in the most efficient war and death machine history has seen. But hatred of "evil" need not be so overt, usually it is wedged deep within the psyche, insidiously working from within when our backs are turned.

Words like "trust" and "character" set off a chain of visceral reactions whose power lies in their stealth. When the issue of a candidate's trustworthiness is raised it immediately raises larger questions in the voter: Am I trustworthy? If I vote for candidate X does that make me untrustworthy?

This process of self-questioning occurs regardless of the validity of the charges; as soon as the charge is levied, we can not help but ask the question of ourselves. Once the battleground shifts from the public forum and becomes a question about me, other factors enter in to the equation, such as my fear and insecurity about my own character. However, I can get a quick fix of self-confidence by bashing the character of others, something I think I could not do unless I were of untainted character.

But this technique is only a quick fix. It plays on our fear and insecurity. Stepping on someone else may improve the way I perceive myself relative to others, but it yields no positive growth relative to the ultimate standard, me. The power of the appeal, however, lies in the fact that these psychological skirmishes rarely traverse the borders of conscious thought. It is impossible to apply logic to emotive reactions.

In this election character is definitely an issue, my character as an individual. My vote implicitly answers certain questions. What type of value system do I subscribe to? How do I deal with my own natural fear and insecurity? Am I about consensus or division? Am I about love or hate?

Bush has valid school voucher plan

BY JOHN SHIRE

An issue of relevance to the Bucknell community in this year's Presidential election is undoubtedly educational reform. Many conservatives favor a plan that would allow for students to choose between public, private and parochial schools, funded by the public in voucher form. Conservatives advocate this type of reform because it maintains the free market system.

In contrast, many liberals are bitterly opposed to a voucher system because they believe that funding private education with public money will deteriorate an already crumbling public education system. Liberals therefore suggest that money used to fund the vouchers ought to be used solely to improve the public education system. This is the plan put forth by Governor Clinton and it has received tremendous support from both major teachers' unions.

Why? Because teachers' unions are most closely associated to the public system as opposed to the private sector; however, may I suggest that more often than not, private schools do offer an advantage over public schools in the sense that the student-to-faculty ratio in a private school is lower than that of public schools. This often results in increased participation by the student during each class, and thus serves to stimulate the minds of young influential students at ages when their intelligence craves nurturing. In this respect, the conservative approach to educational reform can be viewed as sound reasoning.

Why deny individuals an opportunity to access greater attention by instructors? In the public systems, instructors are often overburdened, their classes are over-enrolled and their reimbursement is a fraction of what it ought to be. These conditions are not conducive to accelerated learning, and in many cases these conditions prevent students from attaining the encouragement, attention and skills that can be provided in a setting geared toward individual students. Having experienced the perils of the public system myself, in a school that produced twenty-five National Merit Finalists in my junior year (the highest in the history of Montgomery County, Maryland), I know that even the finest and most highly regarded public school systems are a far cry from private schools that cultivate the thinking of young minds and encourage a pursuit of knowledge.

The only reason that public institutions have been able to compete at all with private institutions is because of the students, the oh-so bright students who strive on their own to acheive the goals that they believe will direct them to a bright and successful future. These are often the students who cannot afford to attend private schools at the secondary level. If many of these students had their way, they would jump at the chance to attend the private schools. The voucher system proposed by the Bush administration will provide for this greatly desired opportunity.

Let us not be hasty in discounting all that Bush has to offer. I would encourage all to consider this matter. For although the $3,000 provided by the voucher for each student would only cover a third or fourth of the cost of many private schools, it is definitely a help for many who would otherwise not even be able to consider enrolling in the private system.

Security requests the return of stolen billboard

TO THE EDITOR:

Last Monday night, a person, identified as a Bucknell student, removed a display poster from the lobby of the Lewisburg Campus Theatre. The theatre manager retrieved the poster from the young man. On Tuesday afternoon, someone again entered the lobby of the theatre and removed an expensive movie rating poster.

The Campus Theatre is a Lewisburg institution. It operates on a meager budget with the support of the community. It is one of a very few, old time, full size theatres reminiscent ot a bygone era. How many of us have viewed first run movies at the Campus Theatre for the long gone admission price of $3.50? If the person who removed this display, with the intention of using it as a room or apartment decoration, would return it to the theatre or Bucknell Public Safety Office, he or she would be performing a community service. No questions will be asked. Thank you.

that prevention is not 100% sure, BPC accepts responsibility, if and when, such injuries are incurred by a group. Most importantly, BPC and FLAG&B were able to establish, through mutual respect, an understanding of how each organization works ensuring future cooperation and communication between us. Again, I would like to thank FLAG&B for increasing BPC's awareness of an important, yet often overlooked, issue that is central to the lives of many Bucknell students.

Like many students, FLAG&B was unaware of the process in which BPC and BAC select the entertainment brought to campus. As a committee, we preview audio and video tapes along with the informational pamphlets we receive from a number of agents. This, in addition to the knowledge we have of performers first hand (because they performed here, at another college, or on TV) is how we form a selection list. We choose acts that we feel will be enjoyed by the students, taking into consideration the different likes and dislikes of a large student body and any feedback, positive or negative, that we receive from the audience, classmates, and friends. From here, we discuss those acts that we most want, when we want them, and develop a tentative calendar based on this information. The next step is to contact the various agents to find out if the performers are within our budget and if they are available on the particular dates. Then it is a matter of finding compatible dates, making the calendar permanent and requesting the actual contract.

It is our goal to program a wide variety of entertainment. Although it is difficult to please everyone all of the time, we realize that there is room for improvement. Bison Programming would like to invite all of you to make suggestions of who you would like to see perform in the Bison and to bear your opinions—positive and negative—about those that you have already seen in the Bison. It will help BPC tremendously and enable us to program more and better programs for you. Contact BPC at the OSA, third floor Langone Center x1217.

Reader is angered by environmental views

TO THE EDITOR:

If there ever was an example of why the environment, small and large scale, is in serious trouble, it is Mr. Triplett's letter in last week's issue. He says animals "do not have any innate rights; the only rights they have are those which we humans wish to accord them." What he means is that humans are somehow not animals, when in reality that's basically all we are, animals with big brains and opposable thumbs with a tendency, like many other animals, to live in groups and kill each other.

But humans, unlike most animals, also tend to kill everything that can possibly be killed in the name of sport and call it jolly good fun. That's what the protest over shooting pigeons is about. There's nothing radical about finding that kind of unnecessary killing stupid and vicious.

He goes on to call Jane Goodall a pathetic scientist, when in fact she is one the finest primatologists in the world, not to mention one of the most important scientists of this century. Her discoveries about chimpanzee intelligence have forced us to redefine what it means to be human. She's shown us that chimps are much more like us than they are different. Still, in Mr. Triplett's mind, chimps are like pigeons, merely animals unable to share, as he states, "my God-given right to slaughter any non-human creature I deem necessary." Now that sounds pretty radical to me, but of course he does have Biblical authority to support the human primate's will to slaughter.

Yes, we did as were we told, or as we commanded ourselves back in the days of Genesis. We've subdued the earth. We slaughter all the creatures we deem necessary because we're convinced it's a holy thing to do. It is a fact that all life, human and non-human, lives only at the expense of other life; it's also a fact that these days humankind isn't just killing animals that shouldn't be killed. Untold numbers of species are now extinct because of US. The atmosphere is being altered and great oxygen-producing forests are being cut down because of us. We poison the ground we grow our food in and the rivers we drink from. We've subdued the earth all right; we've become a uncontrollable plague in our own house. Mr. Triplett was unknowingly on the mark about one thing when he said "Nature is not as delicate and loving as you think." The earth surely won't be delicate or loving when it finally subdues us.

Local theatre thrives

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Whether the movie is a hot, new release or a rare-but-not-forgotten classic, the Campus Theatre carries on the tradition as the only local theater for Bucknellians.

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

It goes without saying that Lewisburg is not an entertainment mecca. We see no sprawling shopping malls, no dance clubs, not even the brightly lit cineplex, which has made moviegoing so convenient as well as pricey. But in its stead we do find one of the more established entertainment traditions for Bucknellians—the Campus Theatre.

Since 1950, Bucknellians have enjoyed the theater's convenient location on Market Street, as well as its relatively low admission fees. "I believe that when the theater was first opened the cost of a movie was less than one dollar," remarked proprietor Jacquie Stiefel, whose husband's family founded the theater. Today's prices are still a far cry from the $7 of a newer cinema; watching a movie at the Campus Theatre costs adults $3, or $3.50 on weekends, and $1.50 for children and senior citizens.

But don't let the low costs fool you into believing that the movies shown aren't new, or that one of the more modern movie houses would be superior in some way. While there is only one screen where a movie plays for about two weeks, patrons are treated to the same amenities offered at a newer theater, including refreshments and a clean, comfortable spot to relax and enjoy a film. In addition to the conventionally popular films, the theater also shows some of the more unusual ones which aren't brought to multiplex theaters because they don't attract a large enough audience. "I think the Campus Theatre offers more movie diversity than a typical theater," commented Ted Temple '96. "I saw Europa, Europa there and it isn't really shown in most places."

Perhaps the most noteworthy aspect of this theater, however, is its unusual Art Deco design. Styled in a fashion reminiscent of our grandparents' generation, one enters the building and is immediately transported back to an earlier, more grandiose era. A huge brass chandelier illumines the intricate murals decorating the walls and ceilings, and an American flag pays homage to a gold velvet curtain which actually parts as the show is about to begin. Time has taken its toll, however, and the theater is showing signs of wear. Some seats have ripped cushions and, due to a water leakage problem several years ago, paint peels in spots off the ceiling, giving the interior a suggestion of fading glory.

But this has not deterred Bucknellians from the theater which has been a part of campus tradition for so long. In fact, in 1989, an management 100 class decided to help refurbish the Campus Theatre in the hopes that it might become a historical landmark. Remarked Management professor John Miller, "One of the companies in the class, Cinema Clothiers, decided to spend their time and labor working on the Campus Theatre. They cleaned the marquis, the carpeting, and did some inside work as well as some painting." Added Stiefel, "We're planning to replace the carpet very soon, and we are also looking into having the ceiling redone in the spots where there has been water damage. A big concern though, deals with authenticity. Any new painting must match the already exisiting murals in that period's style." Extensive repairs and improvements may prove expensive and result in an increased admission fee. "The Campus Theatre is so great because it's a lót cheaper than any other theater," reflected Michelle LaBarge '95. "It would be great if they could repaint the walls and murals, but I would rather put up with a shabbier interior than have the price increase to five or six dollars a seat."

The Campus Theatre is open to the public every night of the year except Christmas Eve. Evening showings are at seven and nine p.m. with an occasional Saturday or Sunday matinee. "For the upcoming holiday season there will be four free Saturday matinees at two p.m.," noted Stiefel. "They will begin on the first Saturday after Thanksgiving. And one will be a charity matinee where patrons must donate two cans of food to charity if they want to see the movie."

YMCA benefit to honor alum, Stiefel

BY ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever noticed the star of David shining in the sidewalk outside the Campus Theater? Look a little closer and you will see that the star is a plaque honoring the memory of Harold Stiefel, former owner of the theater.

Founded in 1942 by the Stiefel family, Lewisburg's Campus Theater was one of a chain of eleven theaters established throughout northern Pennsylvania. Today the theater is run by Stiefel's wife, Jacquie. It is in his honor that she hosts a charity fundraiser each year at the theater.

This year's fundraising event will take place on October 28 at the theater; The feature presentation, "My Fair Lady," an old classic film will be shown at 8:00 p.m. Tickets are $5.00 each and available at the theater and various local merchants. All proceeds go to the West Branch YMCA for the completion of a new facility here in Lewisburg.

Stiefel, originally from the Philadelphia area, came to Bucknell as an undergraduate. He left to enlist into military service and later returned to campus to complete his degree. As a member of Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity as a student, he continued to serve the fraternity as an advisor for many years afterward. He was named the outstanding fraternity advisor at Bucknell and in 1969 was awarded the national SAM Outstanding Advisor Award.

Stiefel was well known and respected both in town and on campus. Dean of Students John Dunlop remembers Stiefel as a "selfless, dedicated and hardworking" man. Dunlop said, "He bridged the gap between Bucknell and the Lewisburg community." Dunlop continued his remembrance, saying that few people have such strong ties to this area as Mr. Stiefel did.

Woolrich, L.L. Bean, Eddie Bauer, Land's End sewn and sold at outlet near Williamsport

J. Crew may mail its catalogs to every student on campus, but L.L. Bean, Land's End, and Eddie Bauer provide an outlet store for its customers right here in Central Pennsylvania. That's right, there's no need to drive to Maine, or even Reading for the savings.

Squall jackets, flannel shirts, and duck boots can all be located at the Woolrich Company Store in Woolrich, Pennsylvania. This small town, about 20 minutes from Williamsport off of Route 220, is home to the Woolrich Company's main factory and parent store.

While the factory primarily produces the Woolrich brand, it is often contracted by other similar companies to work for them under their specifications. Besides L.L. Bean, Eddie Bauer, and Land's End, the Woolrich workers also manufacture clothes, outerwear, and home accessories for American Eagle and Outdoor America.

The outlet store sells "seconds" of these brands. This means that the clothes are not exactly to the company's high specifications. The color of the garment may be a shade off or a button may be missing or a seam might have been sewn a little bit crooked. Often the mistake is not obvious to the amateur eye. It would take a seamstress to pinpoint the error. These seconds are sold at bargain prices, often averaging 40% off of the regular retail price.

Woolrich sells both firsts and seconds of its own brand. The same high quality patterned cotton sweaters and matching skirts that are sold in retail stores across the country can be purchased at the company store for 20% less. Since the items do not have to be shipped anywhere or advertised, these prices are available everyday.

The outlet, which is a huge rustic building the size of a dozen or more rooms, is filled with jackets, wool socks, hats and caps, flannel sheets and nightgowns, and everything else for which Woolrich and the other outdoorsy brands of clothing are famous.

Call the Woolrich Company Store at (717) 769-7401 for store hours and other information.

Gallery exhibit explores history

ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Aesthetic. With this key word in mind, one can take and apply it to the Columbian Quincentennial. Along with the usual lectures, talks, and other passive forms of education, there is an exhibit which brings forth the learning process in a performative idiom.

The "Skin, Sand, Paint, and Metal" exhibit on display in the Center Gallery serves to educate the Bucknell community about the aftermath of the Columbus foray into the New World. One could say the exhibit exists to serve many masters.

One is to raise questions about the lionization of Christopher Columbus. After sailing the ocean blue, Columbus commited a wide array of atrocities against the Native American people, not to mention that he was thousands of miles off course from where he thought he was.

The second is to highlight the positive side of the interactions of two distinct cultures. When examining the artwork, one can see the meshing and interplay of Native-American themes with classical European styles, and vice-versa.

Another theme of the exhibit is to educate people on the true nature of Native-American artwork.

The exhibit was formulated and put together through the collective efforts of both Robert Metzger, former Art Gallery Director, and John Grim, associate-professor of religion, and was funded by the Bucknell Associaton for the Arts. It is part of a two-year-long reexamination of Columbus' discovery of the New World.

"The exhibit raises provocative and problematic questions," said Grim. However, these questions serve to function as a positive exchange. Instead of primarily focusing upon the negative aspects of the Columbus expedition, the exhibit shows the mutual growth that has occured on both sides.

While showing the aesthetic beauty of American-Indian art, the exhibit also tries to inform the viewer of the true nature of the culture. Indian art is often viewed as beadwork, craft, or trinkets.

"Sand, Skin, Paint, Metal," the newest exhibit in the Center Gallery, hopes to teach people about the American-Indian culture through its artwork.

Grim said, "Native Americans do more than beadwork...They do high art."

This high art is not stuck in the popularized versions of American-Indian life or past historical images (for example, the movie Dances with Wolves states quite erroneously, that the Lakota Nation was decimated. However, the Lakota people are alive and well to this very day). The exhibit shows the interconnection of old styles, while affirming the modern and contemporary forms.

Working in conjunction with the "Skin, Sand, Paint, and Metal," exhibit in the Center Gallery is the "Pottery, Mask, and Drum" exhibit on display in the library.

The exhibit, in the library lobby, is meant to work within the curriculum of the Columbus Quincenntenial and various departments campus-wide. The display adds a visual component to the learning process. Artwork on display come from private collections, and includes pieces from the Inupiat Eskimo culture as well.

Roberta Sims of Library Service hailed the exhibit as "a success because of the student interest it has generated."

When Native-American artwork is being viewed, it is often incomplete. The "Upper Plains Shaman's Headdress" is inadequate when viewed upon a headrest. For the Indian aesthetic, it is part of a larger ceremony.

Alongside the visual aesthetic of the headdress comes the audile, olfactorial, and tactile sensations. When the headdress was used in a ceremony, it came alive. There are sights, sounds, and smells that are lacking when Indian artwork is placed within a gallery. The headdress would immediately recall many emotions and feelings clustered along various planes of thought. When it is hung upon a wall, it is missing major components.

Following upon the theme of performative art, Chief Oren Lyons of the Iroquois Confederacy will be present at the Weis Center to actually show the Bucknell Campus the performative Indian aesthetic, on November 5, 1992 at 8 p.m. The Center Gallery will invite spectators to join and participate in the ceremony.

Open mic night in the Bison draws would-be performers

Robin Stutman '93, Carrie Wullen '93, and Allison Arth '93 formed a harmonious trio for the last Open Mic Night.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The thrill of the lights, the energy of a live audience, and the free coffee—that's what makes performing worth the queasy stomach and sweaty palms.

The Coffeehouse series is sponsoring its second open mic night of the year on Wednesday, October 28 in the Bison. An open invitation to anyone with the drive and desire to strut their stuff on stage, open mic night provides a potpourri of student entertainment in a relaxed atmosphere.

The format for the night is casual. Students may sign up for a time slot of their choice, and may perform no more than two pieces.

Brian King '95, co-organizer of the Coffeehouses, encourages all interested musicians to give it a shot. "If you like to just play around, or if you feel you have real talent, show it off," King said.

Robin Stutman '93, Alison Arth '93, and Carrie Wullen '93 accepted the challenge at the last open mic night. The trio performed Helpless by Crosby, Stills, and Nash.

Although Stutman had performed informally at her summer camp, this was the first time she had stepped up under the lights.

"I was a little nervous, I had never performed on stage before, but after it was all over it was worth it. The audience was great and the atmosphere was relaxed," said Stutman.

King also adds that the opportunity is invaluable if you are thinking about signing up for a regular Wednesday night Coffeehouse, although it is not a prerequisite.

"We're always looking for new entertainers. This is a good experience if you're considering later performances," King said.

Open mic night has drawn many of these performers to the Coffeehouse. Many performers found open mic night a good stepping stone to the hour-long Coffeehouse events.

Holly Steger '96 and Beth Bookwalter '96 performed two songs by the Indigo Girls at the last open mic night. Despite their pre-performance jitters, they are considering doing another Coffeehouse event.

"I was really nervous," Steger said. "It was like starting freshman year all over and having to prove yourself again."

But Steger adds that the audience was supportive, and recognized the fact that this was a student-run performance, not a professional one. "It was very relaxed," she said. "It wasn't a major production."

Bookwater agreed, saying that, "At one point in the song (Closer to Fine) my hands were shaking so badly they just slipped off the strings of my guitar. But it didn't matter. Everyone was really nice about it."

"It really funny," Steger said. "I didn't know a lot of people in the audience. But after that weekend of doing open mic night, a lot of people recognized us."

It's true that it takes talent and nerves and stamina to be able to perform in front of an audience, but the paybacks always make it worth your while.

"It's a challenge," said King. "But it's also very rewarding if you can get up there and fulfill that challenge."

Anyone interested in performing should phone Brian King '95 at or Jenny Markewich '95, although no prior notice is necessary. Last-minute deciders can show up at the Bison at 8:30 p.m. to sign up for a half-hour time slot.

Amps, guitar mics, voice mics, and a piano will be provided for students to use in their performance.

The last open mic night resulted in a wave of students arriving last minute to sign up and perform— thus the two song maximum. King hopes the upcoming night will be as successful.

King also hopes that many students who are just toying with the idea of performing will take the initiative to get up on stage. King said, "I encourage people to come down and give it a shot!"

Members of the St. Paul's Chamber Orchestra on the steps of the Ordway Music Theatre, St. Paul. Generally recognized as the America's only professional chamber orchestra, the ensemble will perform tomorrow night in the Weis Center.

Conducted by Hugh Wolff, the St. Paul's Chamber Orchestra will perform tomorrow night in the Weis Center for Performing Arts. The concert will include works by Prokofiev, Rossini, and Haydn.

"The St. Paul Chamber Orchestra is generally considered the best group of its size in the world," said William Boswell, director of cultural events at Bucknell, "and the ensemble is devoted to performing works not often found on the programs of the big symphonies."

Hailed by the Atlanta Journal as a "true prodigy", twenty-one-year-old violinist Gil Shaham will give a highlighted performance of Samuel Barber's Violin Concerto, Op. 14 tomorrow night.

Shaham appeared in 1989 with the London Symphony, covering on a day's notice the ailing Itzhak Perlman. His performance won him high praise in the musical world.

In addition Shaham has performed with several orchestras in the United States and abroad, and is internationally recognized as a virtuoso.

The ensemble represents America's only professional chamber orchestra. Receiving a Grammy Award in 1979 for "Appalachian Spring," the group has presented more than 150 concerts throughout the world each year. Appearances in England, Belgium, and Germany are already scheduled for next May.

Since his professional conducting debut in 1979, Wolff has led many of the world's finest orchestras, including the Boston, Chicago, and San Francisco symphonies, as well as the London and Israel philharmonics and Orchestra Nationale de France.

This season marks Wolff's first as musical director for the St. Paul's Chamber Orchestra.

Recently Wolff was broadcast on a nationally televised "Live from Lincoln Center" program with flutist James Galway and the Vienna Boy's Choir. This year he will appear with the Philharmonic Orchestra in London, the Czechoslovakia Philharmonic and the London Symphony Orchestra.

Tickets for tomorrow night are $20 and may be purchased from the Weis Center Box Office. The concert will start promptly at 8 p.m.

Poetry festival with all the write stuff

BY CAROLINE STEVENS AND NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Whether your tastes run towards Shakespearean sonnets, beatnik symbolism, or just plain ol' Dr. Seuss, Bucknell welcomes all poets, pseudo-poets, wanna-be poets, and everyone else with the inclination to participate in the Fifteenth Annual Poetry Festival.

Bucknell, along with the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts, and the literary magazine, West Branch, has co-sponsored this festival for fifteen years. Since the founding of West Branch, a magazine of poetry and fiction, the Poetry Festival has celebrated the artistic and literary talents of professional, amateur, and rainy-afternoon poets, as well as the birth of the magazine.

The Festival will be held tonight and tomorrow, beginning tonight at 8 p.m. with readings by guest poets. The other events scheduled for this festival will continue tomorrow at 10 a.m., and include workshops, an open reading session, more reading by guest poets, and readings from West Branch. All events will be held in the Standler Center for Poetry, Bucknell Hall.

Among the 10 featured poets are: Cory Brown, who teaches at Ithaca College; Julia Kasdorf, winner of the 1991 Agnes Lynch Starrett Poetry Prize; Patricia Matthews, who teaches poetry workshops with Poets in Public Service; Steven Reeses, who teaches at Youngstown State University; Timothy Russel, a steelworker from Toronto, Ohio; and Jeanne Murray Walker, who teaches English at the University of Delaware.

Pennsylvania poets slated to appear include Harry Humes, founder and editor of the poetry journal Yarrow; Kristin Pape, Charles Rafferty, and Len Roberts. There will also be several surprise poets.

"Shall I compare thee to a summer's day..." -Shakespeare

"I do not like green eggs and ham. I do not like them Sam I am." -Dr. Seuss

Participants are asked to bring with them 10-12 copies of one poem. Readers at the open reading may read up to three poems. Attendants of the workshops and open reading session can receive professional as well as personal help from the guest poets.

English professor Karl Patten, who is directing this affair, encourages everyone interested in poetry to attend this festival.

"There is abundant opportunity to meet and talk with guest writers; indeed, such talks are a vital part of the festival and help make it a time of renewal and celebration," said Patten.

The festival's theme of renewal and celebration is reflected in the "harvesting," of a year's worth of poetry that the poets have been saving, and continued through the party that will conclude the Poetry Festival.

So, if any of the stuff pounded into our literary recesses since junior high English has triggered some poetic talent within you, or if you just have a desire to surround yourself with exceptional writers and "Beautiful/handsome female and male poets" as Prof. Patton proclaims, then investigate the Fifteenth Annual Bucknell Poetry Festival. Who knows, you might just discover the Robert Frost inside you. If not, the least you'll discover is a good time.

How do we compare?

Japanese tea, Zen Buddhism lecture

The department of religion will present two programs connected to Japanese culture, especially the study of Zen Buddhism.

A Japanese tea ceremony will be performed Monday, October 26, at 3 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum by Noriko Narita, instructor in Japanese and East Asian studies. Dressed in a traditional kimono, Narita will play the koto, a traditional stringed instrument.

The ceremony will be preceded by a slide presentation showing tea houses and gardens.

Also scheduled, John Daido Loori, abbot and resident Zen master at the Zen Mountain Monastery in Mt. Tremper, NY, will give a lecture on Wednesday, October 28, at 7:30 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

Loori spent 17 years as a research assistant before undertaking 14 years of training as a Zen monk.

Both event are open to the public and free of charge.

A review and a preview

After brushing off Bloomsburg, Bison cross country teams look ahead to championship meet

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writter

Who would you put your money on to win a cross country race, a husky or a bison? While both animals may lend themselves well to the cold and windy conditions—like the kind that we had in Lewisburg last Saturday afternoon—one particular group of Bison embarrassed the Huskies.

Last weekend, Bucknell outmushed Bloomsburg to sweep the men's and women's meets for the day. Tri-captain Tom Eagleson '93 and captain Kristen Opdyke '93 cruised to top honors in their respective races, and both captains were followed by several of their teammates.

Kathy Wurster '94, Maria Ryan '95, and Jessica Wilhelm '95 captured second through fourth places before a Husky woman rudely prevented the hosts from a clean sweep by just one second. Rebecca Tobin '95 rounded out Bucknell's scoring and punctuated the 16-45 win with her sixth-place finish.

Behind Eagleson, Jim Farrer '93 led the charge of orange with Stephen Clarke '95, Michael Bronson '93, James DeFinnis '95, and tri-captain Judd Jarden '93 right behind him. The Bison went on to capture nine of the first ten places for a lopsided 15-49 victory that ran their record to a perfect 6-0.

Dating back to last season's campaign, in which they placed 13th in the NCAAs, the men's cross country team has been victorious in its last sixteen meets.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

The men's cross country team had reason to smile—even lie down, as Sten Swanston '96 is doing here—as it improved its unbeaten record to 6-0 by beating Bloomsburg this past weekend at home.

Since there are no regular season league meets or standings, the whole season gets decided in one race. All meets prior to the Patriot League Championships are admittedly referred to as mere tune-ups. Head coach Art Gulden likes the chances of both his men's and women's teams at this year's finals.

"We've been at least on, if not ahead, of our training schedules," said Gulden. "The veterans on both squads have put their time in the program and should be ready, while the younger runners have proven themselves ready to take it to the next level."

A week from tomorrow, the two teams will travel to New York's Van Cortlandt Park for the Patriot League Championships. The defending champion men have been publicly challenged by an overconfident and flat-out cocky Lehigh coach and team, and hope to silence the Engineers and all other comers on Oct. 31.

The women, meanwhile, will carry their 3-2 meet record into a wide-open field that Gulden believes "could end up with four teams all within ten points of each other."

Gulden's harriers have earned a weekend off from competition and will continue to focus on the upcoming Halloween Day's festivities in the Empire State. While the men have their title to defend, the University has its Patriot Legaue Presidents' Cup to worry about. Two championships certainly wouldn't hurt.

of the Week

Field hockey continues to work overtime, but comes up winless

Amy Frost—The Bucknellian

Midfielder Tracy Willis '96 makes an attempt to poke the ball away from a Lehigh opponent two weeks ago. The team is 3-3-1 in games in which it has played in at least one overtime period.

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Despite the fact that the field hockey team once again kept late hours at the office, it continued to make only minimum wage in dueling last weekend to two overtime losses. The first defeat came at the hands of Towson State in double overtime, 2-1, and the next day, LaSalle used one overtime period to defeat the Bison (6-7-1) by the same score.

On Saturday, the team packed its bags and dipped below the Mason-Dixon line to do battle with the Tigers from Towson State. Injuries took a bite out of the Bison attack before it left Lewisburg because forward Almira Baldwin '94, the team's leading scorer, was unable to travel due to a wound inflicted upon her during last week's swing through California.

The team also lost the services of its second leading scorer, backer Katrina Mueller '94, as she left her knee brace in Lewisburg. It is often said that bad things happen in threes, so with an injury hampering forward Sue Wells '93, the curse was in full effect.

Head coach Heather Lewis thus had to make a few lineup changes and, amid this sudden adversity, the women in orange and blue got ready to do battle. After playing through regulation with Bucknell's only goal having been scored off the stick of Steph Carfley '93, the field hockey team prepared to do what it had done six times before during this season—play in overtime.

Co-captain net-minder Danielle Ward '93 continued to lead the team by example as she recorded 13 saves on the afternoon. Yet, in the eleventh minute of the second overtime period, a Towson State forward put an end to this epic confrontation with a goal, the fatal blow for the Bison.

It was a disappointing defeat for the team.

"This was a game that we shouldn't have lost. I thought we played hard," said Lewis. "I thought we created scoring opportunities but we just didn't finish. We didn't put the ball in the back of the net."

But with another game the next day, Bucknell's players had to put the setback behind them.

This time the opponent was the Explorers from LaSalle University, and they would be looking for a way to duplicate the outcome of Saturday's game. The Bison, meanwhile, having returned to full strength, looked to redeem themselves.

LaSalle jumped on top quickly as senior forward Kelli McGahey put the ball past Ward within the first three minutes of the contest. This seemed to be nothing to worry about, although the team went into the halftime interval in a 1-0 hole.

The second half looked good for the home squad as it began to control possession of the ball and looked to even up the score.

As play continued, so did the extracurricular activities on and off the field. Baldwin, Bucknell's favorite battle-worn forward, once more suffered an injury—this time being hit in the knee—but managed to play the rest of the game. Then, the ever-spirited Lewis received a red card for yelling at the referees and was later ejected from the contest.

So, with a 1-0 deficit in front of it, the clock running down, and without its coach, the team dug deep. At the 8:13 mark of the second half, and with her knee brace in its rightful position, Mueller beat opposing goalie Kathy O'Neil unassisted to tie up the game. The question remained, would Bucknell be able to finish LaSalle off in regulation?

Not quite.

All further Bucknell attacks proved for naught, and the second half came to an end with the score deadlocked at one. The Bison once again took control of the ball in overtime as they had in the second period, yet a "mental letdown," according to Lewis, resulted in a second McGahey goal to end the game.

"The team was frustrated by the loss," said Lewis, "because they're not being outplayed. This is a good team—they know what they need to do to be successful."

After an 0-2 week, the team now looks forward to this weekend's competition to get back on the right track.

The Blue and Orange will travel to the nation's capital and battle with American on Saturday and then Georgetown on Sunday.

"I think these are two games in which we should come out 2-0," says Lewis. "The key for us is to finish within the circle and be a little mentally stronger for the entire game no matter how long it may last."

Will team settle for the nine-to-five shift, or will it continue to put in overtime hours? Stay tuned.

Women's B-ball team says thanks

The women's basketball team would like to send out a special thanks to all those who participated in our volleyball fundraiser this past weekend. The competition was exciting and the event a huge success!

Congratulations go to the winning team members of both the men's and the co-ed divisions. For the men's division, the winning team consisted of Matt Greiner '93, Dave Holst '94, Howie Livingston '93, Rich Compton '93, Alex Jewart '93, and Dave Bates '93. The second-place team for the men's division included Dave Petrosky '94, Todd Haldeman '94, Lou Difruscio '93 , Jeff Kroh '96, Clay Payne '95, and Avery Soderman '95. The winners for the co-ed division consisted of Matt Clark '93, Ron Bittler '93, Dan Howard '93, Jill Szafranski '93, Allie Zadroga '93, Mollie Laubach '94, and Carolyn Mangan '95.

Thanks again to all participants and we hope to see you at some of the Lady Bison games this winter.

Bison football: the real season starts now

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For all intents and purposes, the first half of the 1992 Bucknell football season was merely the preseason—think of it as a spring training in September. After enjoying their off-day last Saturday, the Bison take a 3-3 record to Worcester, MA tomorrow to face Holy Cross (2-4) in what will be the Patriot League opener for both teams.

Holy Cross has been the traditional powerhouse of the league since its inception in 1986. In fact, in that time the Crusaders have won five of the six league titles, and they sport a masterful 25-1 record against Patriot League competition. This year, however, has been cruel to the defending champs.

First, Mark Duffner, the man who guided Holy Cross to a 60-5-1 record over the last six seasons, took a well-deserved shot at the big time when he bolted back to the land of scholarships at the University of Maryland. The new head coach, Peter Vaas, took over a team that lost nine players who were 1991 First-Team All-Patriot League selections, including last year's Player of the Year, quarterback Tom Ciaccio. Vaas, who graduated from Holy Cross in 1974 and most recently was an assistant coach at Notre Dame, has watched his offense struggle all season. Freshman quarterback Andy Fitzpatrick leads a team which has scored more than ten points only once this year.

The strength of the Crusader team is its defense. With the exception of a 48-0 disaster against Dartmouth, Holy Cross has held every Division I-AA opponent to under 10 points. Linebacker Rob Milanette (88 tackles) and lineman Tom McDonald (62 tackles and six sacks) lead the defense.

To say that Holy Cross has dominated the series with Bucknell is a huge understatement. In eight meetings between the two teams, Holy Cross has won all eight by an average of 28 points. The closest game ever was 17-10 in 1986, and Bucknell has never scored more than 14 points in a single contest. Last year at Mathewson Stadium the Bison stayed close for the first fifteen minutes before getting pounded, 42-6.

For Bucknell to be successful tomorrow, the defensive corps will have to provide some big plays in order to maintain good field position.

The defense did just that in the team's most recent win over Columbia. Defensive end John Lusk '93 and cornerback Matt Noll '93 each converted turnovers into touchdowns in that contest, with Noll's coming as the game-winner. Linebacker Dan Zappa '94 had the best game of his career as he recorded 15 tackles, two sacks, forced a fumble, and intercepted a pass. The junior was named the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week, and his defensive mates will need to produce in a similar fashion this week because it is doubtful that Bucknell will be able to drive the length of the field all day against the tough Crusader defense.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Tailback Matt Walsh '93 has been the workhorse for the Bison thus far this season, and surpassed the 1000 yard mark for his career with a 122 yard performance at Columbia. He will look to continue his outstanding season this weekend as the team travels to Massachusetts to do battle with Patriot League opponent, the Crusaders of Holy Cross.

Elsewhere, many positives have developed over the course of the non-conference schedule this year. Expectations were not very high after last year's abysmal 1-9 campaign, but there have been a few pleasant surprises.

The first is quarterback Travis Kopp '95, who won the starting job from classmate Rob Glus in training camp and has proven himself worthy of the task. Kopp has completed 91 of 137 passes this year (an impressive 66.4%) for 1,057 yards and 11 touchdowns, while being intercepted only five times. His 150.4 efficiency rating places him 13th in the nation in Division I-AA.

Tailback Matt Walsh '93 took over for Brian Henesey '92 as the workhorse on the ground. Walsh, who converted from wideout this year, went over the 1,000-yard mark with his all-time best 122-yard effort against Columbia. He now needs just 27 all-purpose yards tomorrow to top the 2,500-yard mark for his career.

The senior is also on pace to break the Bucknell record for most rushing attempts in a single season, and his average of 140.7 all-purpose yards per game ranks him 21st in the nation in I-AA.

Wide receiver Whitey Berardinelli '93, meanwhile, has been the epitome of a "possession receiver" for the Bison this year. Berardinelli, who is sixth on the all-time Bucknell receiving list with 1,313 yards, has 24 receptions this year. In 20 of them, including his last 17, his catches have resulted in either a touchdown or a first down.

Another unsung hero has been tight end Mark Gentile '95. The 6'6" sophomore, who was converted from quarterback this year, has been an excellent target for Kopp. He has scored at least one touchdown in each of the last four games, and is Bucknell's leading scorer. Gentile has caught 12 passes this season and scored on seven of them.

The strength of the defense has been at linebacker, where Zappa and Russ Strohecker '95 have played nearly every down this year. This provides much-needed stability for a defense that has been riddled by injuries.

The major weaknesses thus far have been the defense and the kicking game. Bucknell's opponents have averaged 404 yards of offense per game, which is way too high for comfort since the Bison schedule has been rather easy to date. Poor play in the secondary, as well as a lack of a pass rush, have allowed opposing quarterbacks to work the field and the clock.

Placekicker Erik Hacker '95 lost his job after converting just four of eight extra points and missing both of his field goal attempts. Justin Frick '94 took over the job, and while he has made eight of nine conversions, the coaching staff still has refused to show enough confidence in either kicker to attempt field goals. This contributed to Bucknell's three-point loss at Towson State on Sept. 19, when head coach Lou Maranzana passed up a medium-range field goal to go for it on fourth down. The strategy backfired, and it may have cost the Bison the game.

All of this praise and speculation about the season thus far can be thrown out the window, however, starting tomorrow. The only record that counts now is in Patriot League games, and that record is 0-0. Bucknell's hopes for a league title are certainly alive, although on paper it may not be the best team in the conference.

Following tomorrow's game, Bucknell will return home for Parents' Weekend to play the Fordham Rams on Oct. 31.

tone for the game early, scoring both of its goals in the first half.

The Bison opened up their offense on an unassisted goal by Alex Kogan '94, and a header by Scott Tardibuono '93, assisted by Ryan Bucceri '94, ended the scoring in the first half. Tardibuono's goal was his third of the season.

"Basically we were looking to salvage a respectable record out of the season," said Tardibuono, "and although they were not the Delaware team of years past, we really took it to them. It felt good getting back into the win column."

Bucknell continued playing good defense in the second half, holding Delaware scoreless, as Wrigley recorded his fourth shutout of the season.

With this win, the team is just one game under .500 with four games left to play, including tomorrow's home match against Shippensburg and Tuesday's match at Penn State. Without a shot at the post-season, the Bison must look to next year, and with a very young team they will be shooting for a winning record.

If you're happy and you know it, clap your hands!

Athlete of the Week

Mark Wrigley '94

Men's soccer goalie Mark Wrigley '94 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of October 23 for yet another sterling seven days in goal for the Bison. This past week against the Blue Hens of Delaware, Wrigley recorded his fourth shutout of the season in thirteen opportunities.
Wrigley has maintained an astounding 1.43 goals-against average and a .807 save percentage, both of which have kept Bucknell in well over half its games.
The junior net-minder hails from Portland, Oregon and is pursuing a degree in the liberal arts.

Women's soccer stays on rollercoaster

Bucknell brings the kitchen sink against King's College, gets sink back vs. Cornell and Loyola

BY T.K. DRAPER AND BILL BROWN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Bucknell's women's soccer team continued on an unsteady course this past week, dropping two out of three games. The Bison beat King's College at home, but fell to Cornell and Loyola on the road.

The team collected its most recent victory as it prevailed over King's College this past Saturday by the resounding score of 8-0. While playing on Lewisburg turf, the Bison fired more shots on the opponent's net than the visitors would care to remember.

Sophomore attacker Sara Patiro led the offensive fury as she recorded two goals and added two assists. The second of Patiro's two first-half goals was skillfully buried in the top corner of the net amid a plethora of King's College defenders.

The presence of Lisa Gibbons '95 once again emerged as a scoring threat as well. The sophomore, who has been a nightmare for other teams to defend against for the better part of this season, broke out of a mini-slump with a hat trick. Her first goal came after the ball was pushed far into the offensive zone by Patiro and the stealthy Gibbons sped her way past the defender, beating the already committed goaltender to the far side of the net.

Kerry McDonnell '96 put in the team's sixth goal at the 28th minute.

Coach Toby Lovecchio's belief in the vast improvement of freshman attacker Joanna Conard, meanwhile, was reinforced when she scored midway through the second half with an assist from forward Stephanie Ruggiero '96. Finally, midfielder Jessica Wright '95 capped off the Bucknell scoring when she tacked on the eighth goal of the game with five minutes to go.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Midfielder Joanna Conard '96 begins the Bison scoring attack that had been dormant over the last few weeks. The team will look to open it up against William and Mary on the road tomorrow.

Ever-steady goalie Kim Fekel '93 recorded a shutout with help from her defense, which managed to keep King's College out of Bucknell's end of the field for the majority of the match.

When the dust had cleared, the women's team had blistered the opposition with an unimaginable total of 51 shots on goal.

But after the Bison pounced on King's College, they had to travel north to take on a very tough Cornell team on Sunday. The results were quite the opposite, as the visitors were pounded unmercifully, 7-0.

Similar results took place on Wednesday against Loyola, as the Bison offense was shut down completely for the second game in a row by its opponents. This time, though, the margin was a respectable 1-0.

Lovecchio attributes this lack of offense to the team's inability to take advantage of prime scoring opportunities. Although they have not been terribly plentiful, such chances have occurred and the Bison simply have failed to bury the ball in the back of the net. Hitting the post may be close, but points aren't recorded for striking the crossbar.

"The kids are trying," Lovecchio said later, obviously in the throes of frustration. "The talent is there—it's just that play in the game has to be more intense."

As the head coach of a Division I program, Lovecchio will not be satisfied until the techniques taught in practice are fully carried out on the field during games.

Lovecchio looked back on their schedule and highlighted five teams who had the Bison beaten before the two squads even took the field. As a result, out of ten opponents that Bucknell should have competed with strongly, the Bison have won a paltry five matches. It is possible that this fact illustrates the wavering intensity level displayed by the team.

"I know they are prepared," said Lovecchio. "It just comes down to doing it on the field."

The Bison only have three more games to prove themselves in this season, as the Patriot League playoffs are now out of the picture. Highly-touted William and Mary will play host to the team tomorrow at 1:00 p.m., and a win against this squad would go far in salvaging what has thus far been a shaky campaign.

Later next week the Lady Bison will square off against Scranton and St. Francis at home to round out the regular season. They will hope to regain their offensive punch and surpass their 1991 win total of seven games in these two contests.

Water polo team faces nation's finest at home

BY MATT ZARTMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The men's water polo team had a rare home date last weekend and compiled a 2-2 record in Lewisburg against some of the toughest teams in the Mid-Atlantic Conference.

A large crowd was present at the Freas-Rooke Pool on Saturday morning to watch Bucknell's first game against Navy, in which the Midshipmen often moved ahead at times by one or two goals only to have the Bison (8-7) storm back to tie the match.

Down by one goal late in the final period, the Bison created several offensive opportunities to put in the tying score. Navy's defense held, however, and the Bison came up short, 13-12.

"We had every chance to win that game," said coach John Zeigler '91 of the disappointing loss.

Goalie Rupert De Vink '94 had an exceptional game, as he racked up ten saves during the defeat. Team captain Chris Retzler '93, who scored two goals and had three assists, was pleased that the young team played so well but said that "We were still disappointed that we ended up losing the match."

Later in the day the Bison squared off against Queens, and were able to bounce back from the earlier defeat to the Middies with a 17-11 victory. De Vink continued his great day in goal as he collected eleven saves.

"Queens has one really good player. We concentrated on shutting him down, and I think that we did a good job of doing just that," said Zeigler.

Sean Tierney '95 had an excellent game as he went on a seven-goal rampage against the visitors from New York.

Sunday morning began with a match against Slippery Rock University, the top team in the MAC, and the Bison were soon wishing that they had eaten a bigger breakfast.

"We came out kind of flat, and let them dictate the tempo of the game. We never really got into the match," said Zeigler of the demoralizing 18-6 defeat.

Sunday morning began with a match against Slippery Rock University, the top team in the MAC, and the Bison were soon wishing that they had eaten a bigger breakfast.

DeVink continued to trouble the opposing offense as he posted his second eleven-save game of the weekend.

The final match for Bucknell was against Iona, and it was a big game in terms of the Mid-Atlantic Conference standings since this would be the Orange and Blue's only match against them before the MAC championship in Princeton next weekend. The Bison came through in the clutch with a 9-8 triumph.

"We rebounded nicely against Iona," said Zeigler after the loss to Slippery Rock earlier in the day.

Tim Nesvig '96 put in an impressive four goals, and DeVink again had a strong day in the net with yet another eleven-save effort.

One of the biggest reasons for Bucknell's success over the weekend was the play of Retzler, who scored nine goals and made six assists over the four games. Zeigler said of his captain, "He has started to fill into the role as a leader on the team. He had an outstanding tournament."

Overall, the coach was pleased with the way that his team performed over the weekend.

"We showed that we can play intense water polo, and now all we have to do is put that intensity together for two or three games in order to start winning championships," said Zeigler, who went on to express his gratitude for the large fan support that the men's team received throughout the weekend. "The good attendance, especially at the Navy game, really got the whole team fired up."

This weekend the Bison will hit the road again as they travel to Long Beach, CA to compete against some of the top teams in the country in the 49er Water Polo Tournament. Bucknell is one of only two teams that were invited from the East to play in the tournament, and its first match will be against fifth-ranked U.S.C.

"I always look at this trip as a learning experience," said Retzler of the expedition. "We have a very young team, and this trip will be a great experience for them. I wish that I could play here another year or two because we are going to have some superb teams in the near future."

Women's volleyball earns first league win

This past week the Bucknell women's volleyball team accomplished what it had only done twice prior to now—win.

The Bison, who were 2-15 overall and 0-1 in league play, went up against Patriot League rivals Fordham and Colgate at Fordham last weekend, and began their quest for victory number three versus the Red Raiders.

In the first game, 'Gate came out extremely strong and punished Bucknell, humiliating them 15-0. In the next game the Bison fared better, but still lost 15-11. However, the Spikers did not roll over and call it quits, as they fought back in impressive fashion to take the third game of the match from Colgate, 15-13. Unfortunately, the Raiders proceeded to waste no time in diminishing Bucknell's hopes, defeating them 15-12 in the final game.

The Lady Spikers collected a respectable 33 kills throughout the match, and were led by co-captain Aubrey Schneggenburger '95 and Katie Steele '96 with nine and six kills, respectively.

The following day Bucknell went up against Fordham, still in the hunt for that elusive third victory. Game one had glimpses of hope as the Spikers showed encouraging signs, winning impressively 15-5. Looking for the three-game sweep, the Orange and Blue continued its high standard of play and won the following two games decisively, 15-9 and 15-13.

The Lady Spikers collected 35 kills in their victory and were led by Heather Hoehn '94 (ten kills) and Schneggenburger (seven kills) which helped the team to tally a hitting accuracy percentage of 24% throughout the match.

"We came out focused against them [Fordham] and that's what made the difference," said Schneggenburger. "Our intensity was there. We were placing the ball well. The momentum was on our side of the court."

The victory against the Rams serves as an important building block for the young Bison, and ended a seemingly never-ending ten-game losing streak while providing the team with what was only its second triumph within the Patriot league since the league's inception.

DINK SHOTS
Bucknell is seventh in the Patriot League standings with a 1-3 record, trailed only by the Crusaders of Holy Cross.

The win matched the total number of victories that the Bison had a year ago and gave them their first victory in the Patriot league this season.

On Wednesday, the Orange and Blue players were invaded by the Leopards of Lafavette, and they hoped to use their momentum from their latest victory to pick up their second league win. Yet, it was not to be.

The team unloaded its brigade of heavy hitters early, as it went on to win games one and two by the identical score of 15-8. As has been the pattern this season, a pillar of strength was provided by freshman standout Steele, who led the way with 16 kills, 4 blocks, 2 aces, 5 digs and an outstanding 47% attack percentage for the match. Schneggenburger was also an offensive force as ten of the balls she hit found empty spaces among the Lafayette defenders.

With the Lady Spikers on the verge of victory number four, however, everything seemed to unravel before their eyes. Lafayette, with its back up against the wall, took game four by a 15-10 count. They kept their intensity and determination and squeaked by the Bison in game four, 15-11. The match was deadlocked at two games apiece and it seemed as if the ever-elusive win would escape the Bison once again—and it did, as the visitors edged Bucknell for the final game and the match, 15-13.

With three matches remaining before the season concludes, the Lady Spikers will be in hot pursuit of victory number four today on the road against Boston College and Iona.

Next Friday, Oct. 30, the team will travel to the Big Apple to battle against Vermont and host team Columbia to round out its scheduled competition before the Patriot League Championships.

Commentary
Is it too late to change?

Before a concrete decision is made on the revised academic calendar by the trustees, faculty, apostles, or whoever handles the matter, perhaps more serious thought should be given to how the proposed plan would affect Bucknell's athletic teams.

Although the academic schedule should be foremost in the minds of the administration and faculty, it cannot be overlooked that sports comprise a large portion of student life here at the University, both for participants and fans. This being the case, the following considerations should be examined before the new calendar system is installed:

•As things stand now, the earlier proposed starting date to the fall semester would make the late summer mini-camps that our teams have much more difficult for coaches to hold, as they would dig even deeper into the time reserved for the students' vacations and summer job schedules. In the ensuing bid for these last few precious weeks of August, both team staff and players would face more stumbling blocks than ever in trying to make it to Lewisburg early for pre-season practice.

•Similarly, a radically-shortened winter break would hamper the pre-season efforts of our spring sports clubs. January has been used by these teams to prepare for the second semester athletics as well and, if too much of this month's free time is hacked away by the new calendar, these teams will suffer like their fall counterparts.

The weeks in late December and early January are especially vital, furthermore, because they allow teams the freedom of traveling out of state for away games without having to miss classes. Faculty members, stand up and take notice.

•Finally, and perhaps most importantly, earlier exam periods for both semesters under the new calendar system stand a greater chance of denying players the opportunity to play in championship tournaments if they happen to occur at this time. This would be a tremendous blow to our athletes—after all, playing a whole season only to miss the championships is like studying for a test throughout the semester only to find yourself locked out of the room on exam day.

The argument has been made that our "frame-of-reference" schools have worked out this problem, but what is such a claim worth in the end? At least, I suppose, we would be able to take heart in the knowledge that our student-athletes will be as disenchanted as those of Colgate and Lehigh.

What our athletes are basically being told is that, since other colleges with similar calendars are making their sports teams suffer, we should have no problem in undergoing the same disappointment. This is hardly acceptable as a viable defense of the current schedule.

We have heard that it is already too late to do anything about the revised calendar. However, as long as there remains such a glaring problem in the present plan, things should never be considered as being past the point of no return.

It should be kept in mind that this commentary is not a criticism, but rather an admonition, for those involved in the restructuring of Bucknell's future calendar system. While academics are of prime concern above all other matters, we must remember that our athletic programs provide the student body with another crucial aspect of the collegiate experience. In order that a handful of headaches can be avoided later, let's make certain to exhaustively consider these potential problems now.

Men's soccer shocked by Rams, 1-0

The Bison lose in OT to Fordham, ending shot at post-season play; knock off Delaware on Tuesday, 2-0

By Mike Melesky and Neil Bardach

The hopes of the men's soccer team for a berth in the Patriot League playoffs were stifled Saturday as it lost a heartbreaking match to Patriot League foe Fordham in overtime, 1-0. Coming into the game, the Bison (6-7) knew that the contest was a must-win if they had any chance, however slim, to extend their season, and they played as if they wanted it.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Head coach Craig Reynolds searches for answers as he watches his team's chances for post-season action slip away.

Bucknell fought hard throughout the match, but Fordham's coach summed up the game best when he incredulously repeated, "Luck was with us, luck was with us" as he exited the field after the stunning finish.

Early into the game, it seemed as though the Orange and Blue would dominate, and indeed they did. Despite failing to score, the Bison outshot Fordham 9-3 in the first half, and earned seven corner kicks to Fordham's none. Also, they forced Fordham's keeper to make four times as many saves as goalie Mark Wrigley '94, who had perhaps his best game of the year, especially in the second half.

Bucknell's best chance to score came with only thirty seconds remaining in the opening half. Thomas Rollet '96 moved the ball down the left side, and drew the defense toward him. In the process, the Fordham keeper drifted out of position, leaving the goal mouth open, and Roller played a near-perfect ball into the center. Unfortunately, the ball rose slightly too much, and Jon MacKenzie '93 put a shot high off of his head that struck the crossbar.

The highlights of the second half were far from being high points to the game. The referee issued three cautions in the second half (accompanying the two issued in the first 45 mintues). However, a usual bright spot for Bucknell once again shone through. Wrigley made four magnificent saves in the second half (eight in the game), including a few that looked certain to hit the back of the net.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

A look of despair overcomes the bench of the men's soccer team as it can only sit back and witness the end of its hopes to see action in the league tourney.

The only goal of the game came with just thirty-six second remaining in the final overtime. Fordham was awarded a free kick on a questionable call just outside the Bucknell penalty area, and as the seconds ticked away, a Ram forward fired a curving, hard shot that was barely out of Wrigley's reach.

What happened next was a sight that many in attendance that day in Lewisburg would hope to forget. Fordham players came streaming off of the bench, mingling with their starters in a joyous swarm close to midfield. On the Bucknell side, the Bison wore looks of glazed astonishment on their faces, perhaps in the final realization that post-season play would not be their lot in 1992.

"From a team standpoint, the goal killed any chance for us of advancing to the playoffs," said midfielder Scott Tardibuono '93. "It was a frustrating defeat because we lost to them by the same score last year—we were really looking for some revenge."

The loss dropped the Bison to 1-5 in the Patriot League.

On Tuesday, the Bison traveled to the University of Delaware and rebounded to defeat the host team, 2-0. Bucknell set the

The Lady Bison continued to tear through the competition in 1992 last Saturday as it doubled-up on a tough Drexel team at home, 6-3. The victory over the Dragons boosted Bucknell's season record to 12-1, and the team's match the next morning against Robert Morris was cancelled.

The Bison currently sit atop the Patriot League standings with an immaculate 6-0 league record.

"I thought the team played really well, especially coming off winning [last week]," said captain Kymm Carlson '94 (9-4 overall, 4-2 in the league at number three singles). Carlson played Eva Ruic De Cuzuriaga, whom she lost to in a blowout last season, and battled to a three-set win, 4-6, 6-4, 6-4.

"It meant a lot for me to beat her, since I lost so badly last year," said Carlson.

Number one seed Julia Diaz '95 lost to Rebecca Murphy, 4-6, 5-7, while Kristina Lutter '95 won a hard-fought match, 4-6, 6-3, 6-2, over Dragon Joan Glass. Lutter's victory was her thirteenth of the year in as many outings at number two singles, and she is a perfect 6-0 in the Patriot League.

Lauren Weihl '96 continued her dominant play as she coasted to an easy 6-1, 6-0 cakewalk over Ying Chiang. Sara Allen '96 (13-0, 6-0) and Erika Anhood '96 both won in straight sets, 6-2, 6-3.

"Once again, I was really impressed with how well our freshmen played and handled themselves," said Carlson, who is the oldest member on Bucknell's team. The squad has no seniors on its roster, and Carlson is the only representative from the junior class for the Bison.

In doubles action the team had significantly more trouble, as two out of the three teams dropped matches to the opposition. Christine McMillan '95 and Katherine Ziegler '96 lost in straight sets, 5-7, 0-6, while sophomores Jennifer Markewich and Ashley Crary won, 6-3, 6-1. In a dogfight, freshmen Mandy Kalish and Sherrie Diveglia lost a long match, 6-4, 6-7 (7-3), (7-0), and 6-0 in the tiebreaker set.

Elsewhere, head coach Rose Ewan was named Patriot League Coach of the Year last week after her women blitzed the opposition in the league championships at Bucknell on Oct. 10-11. The fourteen-year mentor has compiled a sterling 136-103 record while in Lewisburg, and looks to better that record significantly in the years to come with her young squad.

The team will travel to the Towson State Tournament today to finish off what has been an extraordinary 1992 season.

Extracurricular travel time questioned

By Kristin Klingenberg
Bucknellian Staff Writer

A new policy is being drafted that will address the issue of students, particularly first-year students, missing classes due to involvement in off-campus athletic events, class trips, and other extracurricular activities.

Members of the Faculty Advisory Committee on Athletics have been discussing this issue for the past year and a half, and are currently formulating a proposal which could restrict first-year students from missing classes because of off-campus extracurricular events for a portion of their first semester at Bucknell.

The advisory committee originated three years ago at the request of Rick Hartzell, director of physical education and athletics. According to Hartzell, the committee meets to discuss a variety of issues concerning the athletic department. However, he stated that this issue has been the most controversial and "there has been a lot of emotion on both sides."

Hartzell said the committee is now trying to "write a draft policy for any extracurricular event that gives everybody a rule of thumb to follow in terms of being out of class." Rose Ewan, associate athletic director for women's sports, women's tennis coach, and also a member of the advisory committee, agreed that such a policy "will reach farther than athletics."

According to John Wheatcroft, professor of English and committee member, part of the reason this issue is receiving increased attention at this time is because of the faculty's concern over first-year students' involvement in the recent trips taken by the women's volleyball team and the water polo team.

However, he stressed that there is "no large-scale antagonism" between the coaches and the faculty. Rather, Wheatcroft said that conflicts arise because goals and values are not always identical and he stated his belief that "what goes on in the classroom is primary."

Hartzell stated, "my intent is to take the student out of the middle" of potential conflicts between demands placed on the student by both their professors and coaches. Wheatcroft also expressed the concern that often "the student is caught between the coach and the professor," and therefore a policy is needed to alleviate the pressures placed on first-year, first-semester students who are learning to adjust to college and to the level of work required at Bucknell.

However, other members of the committee do not agree that there is a need for a formalized policy. Ewan stated that such a restrictive policy would "insult [first-year students'] innate intelligence," adding, "learning to budget time is an acquired skill." She said that student athletes could learn and grow from making decisions about their activities.

Tim Sweeney, chair and professor of management and advisory committee member, stated that the "frequency and magnitude of the incidents that have presented problems have been isolated" and therefore "can be dealt with on a case-by-case basis," instead of instituting such a formalized policy.

Sweeney does not

BSG approves funds for weight room renovations

By Laura Hinsman and Jessica Sklute

A vote was taken during the last week of September by Bucknell Student Government to appropriate funds for the further renovation of the weight room in Davis Gym.

The representatives of the Bucknell student body voted to allocate $18,134 towards this project.

The total cost of the project has been estimated by Rick Hartzell, director of physical education and athletics, to be $35,234.

The remaining cost of $17,100 not covered by the recent BSG vote is to be donated by The Bison Club. This group was created to fund athletic and recreational activities at Bucknell.

The goal of the project, according to Byron Frey '94, head of the BSG appropriations committee, is to "replace broken equipment and add additional equipment so that the general student body can use the weight room even when teams are lifting."

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Many Bucknellians work out on a regular basis at the weight room. Above: Matt Morton '96 spots George Jaquette '96 on the bench press .

Since the weight room is so heavily utilized, these improvements will affect a large portion of the student body and will complement the other renovations to the athletic complex.

"With all the effort that has been put into improving the athletic facilities, it's good that the outdated weight equipment is being replaced," said Lisa Fink '93, student weight room employee.

According to Mike Thomas '94, BSG President, the initial motion to appropriate funds for the weight room renovation was prompted by a recent poll of student opinion taken by BSG. The poll asked students to identify specific complaints about the university and its facilities.

Says Thomas, "We were looking for a project that would benefit the most students on campus, so in order to do this we sought student opinion."

Thomas explains that the poll was the first step by BSG in an attempt to involve the student body more directly in student government decisions.

Thomas adds that BSG's effort to take in student opinion, and adapt BSG's decisions to that opinion, is an attempt on the part of BSG to become "an organization of action more than reaction."

Voters gear up as election approaches

League of Women Voters' election guides available to campus community members

By Alisa Bland and Cathy Darrup
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Voters are once again preparing to voice their opinion next Tuesday in voting booths nationwide, and the Lewisburg chapter of the League of Women Voters is doing its part to inform the community of its choices in this year's election.

The League of Women Voters has published its annual "Voter's Guide." The guide is designed to inform the voter of the candidates appearing on this year's ballot, as well as their views on current issues that are of interest to the voter. The guide profiles both national and local candidates.

Judy Anderson of the League has compiled this year's portion of issues pertinent to the local community. The purpose of the guide, said Susan Warner-Mills, President of Lewisburg's chapter of the League of Women Voters, is to "help voters make an informed choice once they determine what their priorities are. Then the voters can choose a candidate with the same priorities."

Although Warner-Mills deems it necessary for both women and men to participate as active voters, she expressed the need for women in particular to take to the polls since "women frequently have different priorities and needs than men do."

She believes that voting is one part of being politically aware and active in community life, but women have traditionally been less likely than men to participate in elections.

"Voting is not only important to women, but to men as well," Warner-Mills said. "But it is particularly important for women to be involved because they are equally, if not more influenced by some decisions than men."

Some of the issues that will affect women in particular are abortion, health care, education and family leave.

Warner-Mills believes that the family leave bill is a big issue this year, and an excellent example of where women would have a different perspective and different priorities than men.

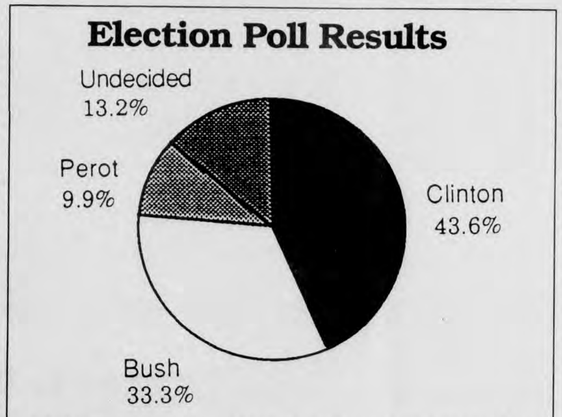
"Women should not be allowed to be put in the position of having to choose between their job and taking care of their loved one," said Warner-Mills.

The "Voter's Guide" purpose is to educate voters on such issues and help them discern which candidate best coordinates with their own opinions.

Anderson began work on the guide in early September. It attempts to be fair to every candidate in that it offered equal space and time for the candidates to answer questions pertaining to the election issues.

The guide was completed in the middle of October and is available on campus at Administrative Services in Marts Hall, from Physics department secretary Sandra Inch, and from Kristin Skarie, director of student activities.

Registered members of the Bucknell community will have the opportunity to vote on Tuesday, November 3 at the Weis Center from 7 a.m. to 8 p.m.



Bucknellians favor Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton by ten percentage points over President George Bush in the presidential race to be held this Tuesday, according to a Bucknellian poll conducted Monday, October 26. Of the 372 respondents, 43.6% said they favor Clinton and 33.3% said they favor Bush.

The poll revealed a large number of undecided voters, 13.2%, while only 9.9% of those polled favored Texas billionaire Ross Perot.

The poll had a 5.0% margin of error, according to Carmen Acuna, assistant professor of mathematics.

Langone serves as advisor to Perot

By Cathy Darrup
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ken Langone, Bucknell alumnus and philanthropist, appeared last Tuesday on "Crossfire," CNN's talk show and political forum. Langone serves as an advisor to Ross Perot and was broadcast along with representatives from both the Bush and Clinton campaigns.

Langone fielded questions from hosts Mike Kinsley and John Sununu concerning Perot's showing in the polls, the recent controversy surrounding a story on "60 Minutes", and Perot's prospective plans for health care and economic recovery.

As for Perot's standing in comparison to Bush and Clinton, Langone was adamant that what the country needs is a fundamental change in leadership.

According to Langone, "There are very serious problems in America that aren't being addressed." He listed rising health care costs, the deficit, unemployment and restructuring as some of these problems.

"The truth is we need to have a lot of things done different in this country," Langone said, "and it's not going to change as long as you have the status quo, which is both [Democratic and Republican] parties."

When Sununu questioned Langone about specifics, or lack thereof, in Perot's plan, Langone condemned "guys on the inside" and their unrealistic programs. "The thing we're not going to do," Langone said, "is to promise pie in the sky unless we have the recipe to bake it."

Langone was elected to the board of trustees and named chair of national giving in 1981. One of Langone's major contributions to Bucknell was his dedication of the former University Center to his wife Elaine Langone.

Residents discuss living conditions

Maxwell assures students that measures are being taken to improve residence halls

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Barry Maxwell, vice president for administration, and Dennis Hawley, assistant director of the Physical Plant, met with residents of Kress, Trax, and Roberts halls Tuesday evening to give students an opportunity to voice their concerns over residence hall living conditions.

The meeting was arranged by Nancy White, assistant professor of economics, after reading about the challenge made to Gerry Commerford, assistant dean for housing, in regard to the Kress showers. "I was hoping students would get a sense of why they were either freezing in their rooms, or freezing or being scalded in the showers," she said.

The question-and-answer session began with many student comments regarding the heating system. Several resident assistants from Kress commented that the heat is so unbearable on their halls that students are unable to study in their rooms. Maxwell and Hawley expressed their willingness to consider suggestions on how to alleviate this problem, including the idea of shutting the heat off completely for several hours a day. "It's a question of whether it's in the best interest of everyone in the building," Maxwell said.

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Nancy White, assistant professor of economics, arranged Tuesday night's meeting.

Students in Trax requested screens for the bathroom windows and mixed faucets on the sinks. Faucets had been promised to residents as part of the summer renovation. Maxwell stated that screens had been removed because of vandalism but that screens for the bathrooms were a possibility. The question of individual screens for student rooms was also raised, and a deposit system for screens was suggested.

Commerford also attended the meeting. He responded to the question about mixed faucets, acknowledging that their absence may have been an oversight. "There is a lot of discussion back and forth between Residential Life and the Physical Plant about what can and can't be done," he said.

Another concern of the students was the rate at which work orders are processed, as well as the priorities the University has for maintaining facilities. Several students have argued that the current stairtower renovation in Trax is unnecessary in comparison to the plumbing problems in the building. "We don't live in the stairwells," commented Jon Roth '93. Maxwell stated that the stairtowers are being renovated because of safety concerns.

In regard to Physical Plant work orders, Commerford said, "My relationship with [the Physical Plant] is very good. If you're not satisfied with what's happening, we'll try to get something done as quickly as possible." He also said that he keeps copies of uncompleted work orders on his desk and checks up on them every two to three days until they are completed. Hawley noted that the Physical Plant receives several hundred work orders a day.

Maxwell, Commerford, and Hawley welcomed comments from students regarding University facilities. "We need to know about these problems when things aren't going well, though some of them can't be solved overnight," Commerford said. In response to the administrators desire to know about future problems, the resident assistants invited members of the administration to attend their weekly meetings.

Traci Mellinger—The Bucknellian

Barry Maxwell tells residents of Trax, Kress, and Roberts halls that he is open to suggestions on how to improve living conditions in their buildings.

White was "immensely pleased" with the outcome of the meeting, in terms of both student turnout and the questions raised by students. "There were things that the Physical Plant had no idea were wrong, and some of them can be done immediately." She emphasized the importance of student follow-up especially in the short term. "It's important for students to know that the lines of communication are open."

White plans to follow-up with a similar event near the beginning of next semester.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, October 22

Officers responded to a fire alarm activation at 1:56 AM, at Gateway Malesardi. Cause of alarm was food left burning unattended on the stove. Alarm system was reset after smoke was cleared.

Saturday, October 24

East Buffalo Police found an unconscious student on the lawn near the public Safety Office at 2:36 AM. Due to the individual's intoxicated condition an ambulance was dispatched to transport the victim to Evangelical ER. Individual will be cited for underage consumption of alcohol by Lewisburg P.D.

Officers responded to Loomis Street, near Music & Arts, for a reported vehicle accident at 2:20 PM, this date. A vehicle operated by a student struck a van in a parking space, causing moderate damage to both vehicles. There were no injuries, and Lewisburg Police investigated the accident.

A visitor to BU reported to Public Safety of losing his wallet. He left the wallet on the hood of his car and drove off forgetting about it. If found anywhere on campus please return to Public Safety.

Sunday, October 25

Officers responded to the first floor of Smith Hall at 1:59 AM, for a fire alarm activation. On arrival it was found that person(s) unknown had activated a pull station for no apparent reason. Pull station was reset and alarm system returned to normal status.

While on routine patrol an Officer found a rectangular case on Fraternity Road near Dana, containing assorted cassette tapes. Owner can claim property at Langone Center Lost & Found Desk.

It was reported to Public Safety that a student had received an injury while attending a party at Sigma Chi. She accidentally stepped on the paw of the house dog, who in turn bit her right foot. She was treated at Student Health Service. The Union County Animal Control Officer is investigating the incident.

Officers were dispatched to Sigma Chi on a report of an individual who had suffered a bite from a white rat. An individual employed by SC received the injury when he attempted to catch the rodent, so as to remove it from the basement. He required no medical attention. Rat was turned over to the Union County Animal control Officer, who will investigate this incident.

Monday, October 26

An employee of Media Service reported the theft of a VCR from a classroom in Coleman Hall, to Public Safety on this date. The VCR was last seen on October 23, and was discovered missing at 8:30 AM, October 26.

Tuesday, October 27

Officers responded to a fire alarm activation at 4:18 on the third floor of Larison hall. Unknown person(s) did discharge a fire extinguisher on the hall for no apparent reason, thus activating the fire system. Due to the heavy concentration of the extinguisher chemicals, it took Officers 35 minutes to reset the alarm system. Two smoke detectors in the hallway were also damaged by the chemicals.

While at Larison Hall waiting to clear the alarm, an Officer observed that person(s) unknown did dismantle a smoke detector on the third floor of Harris Hall. It is unknown when this act of vandalism occurred. Physical Plant contacted for replacement of detector.

A resident of the Mods reported to Public Safety that damage had been done to his vehicle while parked at the Mods. Student parked the car at 9 PM, October 26, and when he returned to the vehicle at 9:15 AM, October 27, he discovered a dent in the left rear door approximately one foot wide.

Corrections

In last week's article concerning computer thefts from the math department, The Bucknellian incorrectly printed that keys were removed from Professor Rose Abrahamson's desk that unlocked the doors of the department.

According to a report filed at the department of Public Safety, the intruder(s) removed a key from an unlocked drawer in Professor Sally Morrison's office, then proceeded to the desk of Rose Abramson, secretary of the department, and removed two keyrings that unlocked other offices in the department.

The Bucknellian staff apologizes for this mistake.

Adminstration reflects on changes since the "Halloween riot" of 1990

BY DEB MANASSE AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Two years ago this Saturday, Bucknell was the site of what has become known as the "Halloween riot." The event, which many describe as a symbol of the discontent that students had about the social climate and the level of student involvement in administrative decisions, initiated what many feel has been a positive move toward improving the social atmosphere at Bucknell.

"I don't think I agree with what happened that night, but what happened because of it was positive for the University," said Edward Dadez, associate dean of student life.

He called the event "an eye-opener" for administration and faculty to the fact that students "wanted to express their opinions, ideas, and concerns about their Bucknell experiences."

The incident involved approximately 900 to 1000 Bucknell students and began on the 200 block of South Seventh Street, eventually reaching the academic quad. As a result of the disturbance, the Lewisburg Police Department, East Buffalo Police, five canine units from the surrounding area, and two fire engines from William Cameron Engine Company reported to the scene. In addition, the United States penitentiary in Lewisburg responded with three buses and 40 staff members, including a SWAT team.

The near-riot originated in town as parties that began in the apartments of several students moved into the streets. "The guy who started it didn't mean to start anything," said Dadez. "All he did was sit in the road and he was shocked when 100 students sat down with him."

Whatever the cause of the riot, it was interpreted by the administration as the culmination of the poor student morale that had been building throughout the semester. "The riot represented students' feelings that their voices weren't being heard," said Dadez. "Some felt that this would be an excellent forum for their voices to begin to be heard."

The administration listened to what was being said that night, according to John Dunlop, dean of students. "We used the incident as a way to get a better understanding of what students felt about life at the University and how they would like it to be," said Dunlop.

According to Dadez, "the riot helped the administration to see the importance of one-on-one and group interaction with students."

"We realized that at one point we were forgetting to have those opportunities for feedback and that students are part of the equation and part of the answer," said Dadez.

Students gathered outside the Bertrand Library where President Sojka answered questions raised by the crowd of approximately 1000.

In the two years since the near-riot, there have been a series of administrative changes intended to directly address the concerns of students. These include a public safety advisory board, the wristband policy, a judicial philosophy task force, and the renovation of the Bison.

These efforts have been an attempt to find a common ground between the various members of the campus community.

"We worked through issues until we came up with something that was more than satisfactory to both students and administrators," said Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services.

Many students agree that the administration's readiness to begin including students in decisions affecting social life has had a major impact on campus morale.

"I think the riot was a morale booster for a week or two, but in the long run it was the willingness of the administration to work with IFC that actually had an effect on the social scene at Bucknell," said Keith Mann '93.

Not all students, however have expressed such positive feelings about the University's social climate. "After the riot things loosened up for one semester and now it's worse than it ever was before," said Sean Grass '93.

Nonetheless, it appears that most members of the campus community are more satisfied with the current social atmosphere than they were two years ago. "There are more social opportunities than there were in the past, especially with the increased programming in the Bison," said Karen Bobeczko '93.

Those who have been instrumental in many of the changes that have occurred in the past two years stress that the effort to move the University forward in the area of student life is ongoing.

"The administration has made a genuine effort to work on some of the issues raised at that time," said Shailor. "We are and will continue to work with students on issues that deal with the social climate on campus."

State police retreated from the front lines of the disturbance as part of an agreement to have students move back on to campus. The crowd then moved to the downhill side of the Langone Center.

Residence halls to close for Thanksgiving recess

All residence halls will be closed from 12:30 p.m. on Wednesday, Nov. 25 through Sunday, Nov. 29, at 10:00 a.m.

According to Gerald Commerford, assistant dean of housing, students required to remain on campus for all or part of the recess will be permitted to stay in their assigned rooms.

However, the outside keyway of all residence halls except Gateway, Faculty Court and Bucknell West will be changed making the building inaccessible for those not registered with the Office of Residential Life by Monday, Nov. 23.

Registered students will be issued an outside door key that will give them access to their facility during the vacation period.

The key may be picked up on Nov. 23 and 24 from the Office of Residential Life, Langone Center 207 or 211.

Residents of Gateway, Faculty Court or Bucknell West must register to stay even though the keyways in those areas will not be changed.

deny that there are "legitimate concerns and problems" and that when a serious incident occurs, the Athletic Department has a responsibility to prevent the problem from happening again." However, Sweeney stated that "the development of formal policy implies much greater problems than exist" currently, as most coaches and professors already abide by generally accepted guidelines for accommodating potential conflicts of students' time.

Ewan and Sweeney both favor a more informal approach to the issue, keeping lines of communication open between coaches, students, and faculty. Ewan cited an example of one of her players deciding not to go on a weekend tennis trip due to an upcoming midterm. Similarly, Sweeney said that he tries to accommodate reasonable requests from students with scheduling conflicts.

Hartzell stated that while it would be ideal if athletic/academic conflicts never occurred, it is inevitable that there will be times when students have to miss class. Nancy White, assistant professor of economics and member of the advisory committee, expressed concerns about missed classes not only for the sake of the individual student, but also for the quality of the entire class.

According to White, there is potential for waste when students do not attend class, as they often have much to contribute to the discussion and quality of the class, and since students teach and learn from each other. She stated that the private costs to the individual student from missing class are cause for concern, but that social costs to the other students in these situations should be addressed as well.

There are concerns about the future level of Bucknell's competitiveness both athletically and in terms of recruiting students if a policy to restrict first-year students is adopted. As a coach with 50% of her starting lineup being first-year students, Ewan questioned how implementing such a policy would affect her team.

She further stated that the competitive edge of players who cannot consistently participate in all of their games will drop dramatically, thus hurting the team. Hartzell expressed concern for the recruitment of qualified first-year athletes; Bucknell actively recruits over 200 athletes each year and part of the reason some of them may come to Bucknell is because they are able to compete as first-year students.

Hartzell added that our frame of reference schools do not have any policies that restrict first-year students' participation in sports events, and that this may place Bucknell at a disadvantage in attracting students.

However, Wheatcroft suggested that other schools in the Patriot League may be able to be persuaded to adopt similar policies, thus removing the advantages or disadvantages for any one school on this basis. He said, "the fact that we have been able to come to agreements with other schools in the Patriot League [on past academic matters] is encouraging."

Wheatcroft stated that he wants to implement a policy so that "students can participate in athletics and also get the education that they are paying a great deal of money for and are devoting a lot of time to."

According to Sweeney, Bucknell already has "an impressive track record when it comes to blending academic and athletic programs." He and Hartzell suggested that this track record may indicate that the current informal arrangements are serving the University well. The advisory committee will meet in November to discuss the draft of the proposal and perhaps make modifications. Barbara Shailor, vice president for student services, declined to comment on the proposal until it is finalized.

Hartzell stated that he hopes to have the issue resolved by fall, and Wheatcroft added that despite differences in opinion, "I have every confidence that this will be worked out."

CARING FOR THE EARTH: AN IROQUOIS VIEW OF LIFE

CHIEF OREN LYONS
FAITHKEEPER — IROQUOIS CONFEDERACY

WITH THE ALLEGANY RIVER DANCERS
NATIVE AMERICAN DANCE TROUPE

WEIS CENTER, BUCKNELL
THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 8 P.M.

NURTURING OUR ENVIRONMENT FOR THE SEVENTH GENERATION

THE CONTRIBUTION OF THE IROQUOIS CONFEDERACY TO THE SOCIO-POLITICAL THOUGHT OF THE UNITED STATES

In the perception of my people, the Houdenosaunee, whom you call Iroquois, all life is equal, and that includes the birds, animals, things that grow, things that swim. It is the Creator who presents the reality. As you read this by yourself in your sovereignty and in your being, you are a manifestation of the creation. You are sovereign by the fact that you exist. This relationship demands respect for the equality of all life.

During the 500 years we have interacted with Euro-Americans over 400 treaties have been exchanged between Indian Nations and the United States. In fact, the Iroquois Confederacy, known as the Great League of Peace, was influential in the drafting of the documents which founded the United States. Absent from the political thinking in the United States, however, has been an understanding of the equality of all life and a perspective for nurturing future life. This respect for future life, in my people's understanding, demands that we look ahead. In all decision-making we consider will this decision be to the benefit and welfare of the seventh generation? Now, it is time for the indigenous peoples to speak about that which we have observed — exploitation of not only the people but also of the earth's resources without any regard for the seventh generation. Caring for the earth, then, calls for sovereign responsibility not simply to yourselves, but to your people, your earth, your seventh generation.

On Campus

Breakin' Bison to host Midnight Madness

Bucknell's men's basketball team will officially open the 1992-93 pre-season with a special "Midnight Madness" practice this Saturday night.

According to NCAA rules, basketball teams may not begin practice until November 1. The Bison will begin their practice session at 12:01 a.m.

The session is free and open to the public.

Observatory hosts open house

The University Observatory will hold an open house from 7 p.m. until 10 p.m. on Saturday, October 31. The open house is presented by the Bucknell University Astronomy Club and the Department of Physics.

If the skies are clear, the telescopes at the observatory will be used to observe Saturn, Venus and other astronomical objects. A slide show and a short video presentation will also be featured.

Post-election analysis to be presented

Nancy Neuman will present a discussion entitled "The Road Ahead: Post-election Analysis" on Wednesday, November 4 at 4 p.m. in Walls Lounge of the Langone Center.

Neuman is a former visiting professor of political science and a former national president of the League of Women Voters.

Greenhouse open to the public

The Biology building's rooftop greenhouse will be open to the community as part of Parents' Weekend activities Saturday, October 31 between 10 a.m. and noon.

The greenhouse is filled with exotic plants from many corners of the world as well as economic plants such as coffee, bananas, loquat, guava, tea, pineapple and taro.

There are also desert areas with cacti, a pond with plant life and fish, a rainforest with orchids and bromeliads, and a bog with many carnivorous plants in a natural setting.

West to discuss women and AIDS

Nancy West, executive director of the AIDS Resource Alliance, will present a religious studies forum and discussion entitled "Women and AIDS: Different Issues, Different Effects?" on Tuesday, November 3 at noon in Walls Lounge of the Langone Center.

The forum is the third in the series, "AIDS: Challenges for Science, Politics, and Religion."

Candlelight tickets available

Tickets are available for the Christmas Service of Lessons and Carols that will take place in Rooke Chapel at 7:30 p.m. on December 5, 6, 7, and 9.

Each member of the Bucknell community is entitled to two tickets. Tickets will be distributed through the LC Box Office in late November and by phoning or visiting Rooke Chapel.

Off Campus

Single sex fraternities prohibited

Bowdoin College has installed a Greek system policy which demands that all campus fraternities offer co-ed membership on both the local and national levels.

The College's Governing Boards recently passed a resolution that will effectively disband the houses in May of 1993.

Religion department to remain intact

The Dean of the College of Liberal Arts at Tufts University has confirmed that there have been "no further changes" in the status of the department of religion, despite a report submitted to the administration in January 1991, recommending that the department's faculty be increased.

In the midst of budget cuts, the University had considered plans in the fall of 1990 to integrate the religion department with another academic department. Instead, an investigation into the matter concluded that at a minimum, three full-time equivalent faculty will be added to the religion department within five years.

AIDS research is funded

A senior politics major at Princeton University has started "Climb for the Cure," an organization dedicated to winning corporate contributions for AIDS research by promoting a climb of Mt. McKinley next summer by nine Princeton graduates.

Climb for the Cure has already raised $80,000 of its $250,000 goal. The money will be given to the American Foundation for AIDS research, known as Amfar.

Students reject obscenity

The student government at the University of Alabama at Birmingham has objected to the purchase of a controversial photograph by the art department on the grounds that the money should be used instead to support students' needs.

Private donations totaling $4,200 were used to purchase "Pieta II", a photograph by Andres Serrano which depicts Michelangelo's statue "The Pieta" in a tank filled with urine and cow blood.

Admissions video will be made available to prospective students

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

At a time when the admissions war between colleges is heating up, Bucknell is preparing for a high-tech battle through the use of two new promotional videos.

In conjunction with the Office of Public Relations and Publications, the Admissions Office set out in the spring of 1991 to produce the videos for students considering Bucknell.

The videos, sent out to a production company last week, will be completed in two weeks, according to the director of admissions, Mark Davies.

The first video is a general piece designed for students wishing to get a feel for life at the university, according to Sharon Poff, director of public relations and publications.

The second video is more specific in nature, she added, in that it is designed for students already accepted into Bucknell but who are considering other schools.

"We think people need to have a good understanding of what Bucknell is about and what we have to offer," Davies said. "The school produced one video seven or eight years ago, but that's been out of date for four or five years."

Davies said he doesn't feel the videos are in response to any specific competition from other universities.

"I don't think it was necessitated by any marketing competition. Research has shown that we need to explore all avenues of marketing Bucknell. We live in an audio/video age, and people tend to want to see things. The videos will allow us to capture different perspectives and seasons at the school."

"We are working hard at the diversity issue, and the best way to get the word out about Bucknell is to get the message out to places we wouldn't normally see."
—Mark Davies, director of admissions

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

In the future prospective students will be able to take a "tour" of Bucknell without stepping out of their living rooms thanks to the new admissions video.

Davies said the videos are part of an effort to reach portions of the country where Bucknell is not as accessible to the students.

"We are working hard at the diversity issue, and the best way to get the word out about Bucknell is to get the message out to places we wouldn't normally see. We would like to place the video in high school guidance offices in rural areas, for example," he explained.

The director added that the videos should not serve as a deterrent, however, to those students who would like to visit Bucknell.

"The videos are just supplemental to spending time at the school. We recommend spending at least three or four hours, although we think an overnight stay gives the students a better feel for the university," he said.

Both admissions and public relations are considering ways in which they can market the videos.

Davies said schools traditionally send their promotional videos to high school libraries across the country.

"We're toying with other ways to provide access to the videos for students looking at Bucknell," he said. "We have a lot of requests for the video [currently in use]."

The first, more general video is 13 minutes in length, and depicts various aspects of the university to attract prospective students, according to Poff.

The second video, 11 minutes long, is more specific and focuses on four students and their experiences at Bucknell, Davies explained.

According to Davies, the admissions office is pleased with the scope of the productions.

"We're really happy with them. The hard part is trying to capture Bucknell in 11 minutes," he concluded.

"We wrestled with the time, and I think it does a good job of showing the diversity, academics and athletics at the school."

Goblins, and ghosts, and ghouls. Oh, My!

Halloween is another excuse for generally sedate people to go wild. Many find themselves compelled to decorate everything in sight or to reminisce of the days of old by escorting little children during their quest for candy. Our college town of Lewisburg does not escape this tradition. Walking through town, one can find all types of decorations, from a simple wreath on a door to elaborate scenes of witches and ghosts. On campus, residence halls hold door decorating contests and find little things to liven up their rooms. In a constant effort to remember that Bucknell is a community within a community, campus organizations take advantage of the holiday season to return a little something to Lewisburg residents. Each year the Pennsylvania State Education Association (PSEA) sponsors an evening for town children to trick-or-treat in safety. Students volunteer to take time out from studying to lead children around Leiser House, Harris, Larison, Smith, and Vedder halls. This year, as always, Halloween season is proving to be a great time for both the young and the young at heart.

Right: (l to r) Matt Troy '96 and Jesse Baker '96 were the winners of the Vedder Hall door decorating contest; Far Right: Tarren Dreistadt is one of the local children who haunted the hallways of the freshman dorms Wednesday night; Below: Some may be content to carve pumpkins, but not those in this house on Saint Mary's Street. There is a twenty-five foot spider temporarily attacking their home.

Clockwise from right: Does Lisa Blackman's '94 little friend, Jessie, have a stomach - ache from eating too much candy; if your grandparents could not make it to Bucknell this weekend, why not pay a visit to the stuffed replica of a grandmother greeting passers-by from her porch swing on North 4th Street; it is not too late to get into the holiday spirit, the Pumpkin Patch on Route 15 still has a large selection of pumpkins and gourds; many Bucknellians liven up their rooms with the friendly (or not so friendly) faces of a jack-o-lantern, but hey, if you are not artistic, try asking your parents to give you a hand.

Kilbourne warns students against the subtle influence of advertising

BY KIRSTEN OLEAN

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

Dr. Jean Kilbourne spoke to Bucknell students about the influence advertising has on the public. She outlined several ideas about how to combat what she described as the negative influence of alcohol advertisements.

Dr. Jean Kilbourne gave a lecture entitled, "Under the Influence: The Pushing of Alcohol via Advertising," on Monday in the Weis Center.

Kilbourne is a well-known speaker on the topic of the influence of advertising on various aspects of our lives. She has appeared on the Today Show and The Oprah Winfrey Show.

Kilbourne also testified before Congress on legislation relating to the role of advertising in alcohol consumption, and worked with the Surgeon General of the United States. Her lecture occurred in conjunction with Alcohol Awareness Week at Bucknell.

According to Kilbourne, alcohol is one of the most highly advertised products. She said that corporations in the alcohol industry are bent on increasing profit, and therefore they push the sale of alcohol.

The alcohol industry spends over $2 billion a year on advertising. This advertising is a primary form of education about alcohol according to Kilbourne, who said that advertisements give a false message about alcohol, without telling consumers about the negative aspects and dangers of alcohol consumption.

"In alcohol advertising, the fantasy that they sell about alcohol is almost always the exact opposite of the truth about alcohol," said Kilbourne.

Her example was an ad for Absolut Vodka which proclaimed, "Absolut Joy." The truth, Kilbourne said, is that although alcohol is a depressant, the industry promotes alcohol as the ultimate path to happiness.

She said that alcohol is also promoted as the magic potion for love, success, wealth, athletic ability and sex without addressing the possible consequences of alcohol consumption.

Kilbourne voiced concern over the fact that the ads fail to mention that 10% of all U.S. deaths are linked with alcohol and that dependency on, or obsession, with alcohol is a disease. She said, "We all assume we are magically exempt from alcoholism." She pointed out, however, that anyone who picks up a drink is at risk of becoming an alcoholic. Advertising, Kilbourne claims, "creates an atmosphere of denial about alcoholism."

According to Kilbourne, people generally think they are immune to the influence of advertisement. However, profit statistics indicate that advertising campaigns affect consumers' likelihood to purchase a particular product.

"Advertising works," said Kilbourne. "It makes us buy the product and it sends us a false message about alcohol." The alcohol industry continues to do this because profit is their top priority, said Kilbourne.

According to Kilbourne, the three main goals of all advertisers are: 1) recruit new users; 2) increase consumption of product; and 3) convince the buyer to switch brands.

Kilbourne said that although the advertising industry claims its only goal is to convince consumers to switch brands, this is only part of the intention. "When selling products that kill people, you have to recruit new users," Kilbourne stressed.

Kilbourne does not support censorship of advertisement and does not advocate pulling alcohol ads from television and magazines. She does, however, have several ideas about how to combat what she describes as a negative influence that alcohol advertisements have on the public.

She suggests counter-advertising, to be funded by excise taxes on alcohol sales. These ads would give the information about alcohol the industry avoids: the dangers of alcoholism, the number of deaths related to alcohol, and other warnings.

She advocates health warnings on the advertisements, like those displayed on cigarette ads. She said that it is time for us to become aware of the attitudes toward alcohol and the source of such attitudes.

"We are paying the price," said Kilbourne She stated that something must be done and acknowledged that the alcohol industry strongly resists the ideas of counter-advertising and health warnings. Above all, she said it is time that "we create a world that people want to live in, not escape from."

Newly created Student Alumni Association receives funding

BY SARA K. WALKER

The Alumni Association Board of Directors recently granted funding to the newly created Student Alumni Association (SAA) in hopes of enriching the students' education and preparing them to serve as future alumni leaders. SAA states in its constitution that its purpose is to "assist the University in reaching the goals of the University by facilitating an active relationship between students, alumni, administrators, and the Alumni Association." The organization was designed to further both student involvement in the University, and the quality of the University as an institution of higher education.

The aims of the SAA include working toward enhancing the ties between present, past, and future students as well.

According to vice president Jody MacArthur '95, "The objective of the SAA is to educate undergraduates who will soon become alumni about what to expect from Bucknell after graduation. It also informs them of what Bucknell expects of them." She adds that "this education will be achieved through programming, and will act as an umbrella organization for other committees on campus."

Membership is available to any full-time student who is in good academic standing. The student must complete an application that will be reviewed by the selection committee. If approved, the student is called back for an interview. This process will occur during the Spring semester of this academic year for any interested applicants.

Another important objective of the SAA is to provide the Alumni Association Board of Directors a line of communication to the student body through a SAA student representative.

Senior gift drive coordinator Linda Hollinshead '93 stresses the importance of how an alumni can take on a more active role. Through the SAA, she hopes to increase students' tendency to give money to the Senior Gift Drive. If students engage early in their lives as an alumni in a habit of giving, Hollinshead believes that they will "see the benefits, and will see monetary support as a way that both students and alumni can help."

The SAA, along with the Alumni Association Board of Directors, feel strongly about the importance of educating undergraduates of their responsibility to the University, and their options after Bucknell. According to Devon Lefebvre '93, Parents' Weekend Coordinator, "The main focus of the SAA is to make students aware of life after Bucknell, and what is available to them."

The SAA is also structured to benefit the University. According to MacArthur, this is important because "Bucknell's Patriot League counterparts also have Student Alumni Associations, and therefore it is important to keep up with the times."

According to MacArthur, the "Student Alumni Association will help increase endowment, and improve alumni relations and annual giving."

The members of the Student Alumni Association Executive Council include: President Denis Maguire '93, MacArthur, secretary/treasurer Becky Harlan '95, publicity coordinator Nicky Wong '94, phone-a-thon coordinator Beth Morilla '95, Homecoming coordinator Deb Brovero '93, Devon Lefebvre, and Linda Hollinshead.

Upcoming events to look forward to from the Student Alumni Association are its Newsletter which will be coming out in late November or early December, the Afternoon Pause on Thursday December 3, its "new" mascot's birthday party in February, and the Young Alumni Career Forum in February.

Who's missing out on what—socially

Classes of 1995 and 1996, you missed the party of the decade. Or did you? For those of us (students, faculty, administration, and local neighbors included) who witnessed and maybe even participated in the Seventh Street Halloween fest of 1990, the scene really wasn't pleasant. In fact, it turned downright scary by midnight.

What began as a little downhill community effort to celebrate the holiday quickly turned ugly. Cans of beer began to be thrown, not chugged. Neighbors who threatened to call the police actually did and the local police called the state troopers, who in turn phoned the S.W.A.T team. The S.W.A.T. team arrived with buses, dogs and tear gas that were usually reserved for our not so fearsome friends over at the Penitentiary. Students shouted, not to be heard above the music, but because they were angry.

All of this commotion and national television and radio exposure over the right to party in peace seemed somewhat silly. Some outsiders questioned our priorities and concerns. Talk of Bubble vision was revived.

Communication between the administration and students was also re-established. Unfortunately, it took blaring sirens and bedside phone calls to the administration to make it happen. Reports of a thousand students gathered by the graveyard prompted Dean Dunlop, President Sojka, and week-old Director of Public Safety Vince DeCerchio to scramble out of bed and to their senses.

A different kind of crowd control than usual had to be implemented. Discussion, not dictations had to be offered.

After that turning point on Halloween night, change was initiated. Task forces and discussion panels were created. While bureaucratic measures such as these are often superficially set up and meant solely to subdue, these have succeeded to a large extent.

The newly implemented wristband policy allows anyone of age to drink on campus. Those who are not old enough to consume alcohol may also drink, but are now held personally responsible for their actions, just as they would be outside of the Bubble.

The Bison now offers respectable, alternative forms of social activities. Coffeehouse is considered "cool" to attend and offer up one's talents. Worthwhile band and comedians also perform in the student eatery now.

To the freshman and sophomore classes—you don't know what you missed and maybe that's a good thing. Gone are the days of lax national alcohol policies and enforcement. Gone are the days of huge keg parties due to pressure from the fraternies' nationals. Gone also is the S.W.A.T. team and overreactive security, however. Random, rigidly enforced security checks of parties are no longer in effect. Students should no longer feel as if they are being spied upon and watched over. Students should no longer really feel the need to riot about their social life here at Bucknell.

Conservatives lambaste jeans day idea

TO THE EDITOR:

Due to a recent rash of columns concerning bisexuality and homosexuality on campus, we thought it was time for a different perspective. The kind of lifestyle an individual chooses to live is, and should remain, a private decision. However, we find it offensive when that lifestyle needs to be made zealously public, so as to affect the entire student body.

For example, we have a problem with FLAG&B's insistence on a Jeans Day. Let's get real for a moment; everyone wears jeans? Since when did a pair of jeans signify homosexual support? If FLAG&B really wants to know how people feel about homosexual rights, why don't they support a "Button Day" or some other event where everyone who wishes to support the cause may do so without affecting the student body at large? Maybe it's time to give Jeans Day a little competition such as a Clothes Day...On October 30, anyone wearing clothes supports George Bush for president!

It is wrong to condemn someone or label them a "neo-Nazi" for having a rigid moral code.

In response to one of the more recent articles published by The Bucknellian ("Are Gays Safe on Campus?" by Joel Wainwright), we would like to question the argument used by the author. Mr. Wainwright, where did you get your numbers? For those readers who missed the article, Mr. Wainwright claimed that at least 10% of the campus is gay or lesbian and that an additional 20-25% of the student body participates in bisexual activity. Those are kind of large numbers don't you think, Mr. Wainwright? We'd like to see the basis for these percentages, especially for the bisexual statistics. Here are some facts you can verify (Newsweek September 14, 1992, page 36-7). This politically correct movement against homophobia and heterosexism may not be as popular as was once thought. Although there is support for equal rights when it comes to jobs (and rightly so), 53% of the U.S. population do not think homosexuality is an acceptable alternative lifestyle. Fifty-eight percent of those polled disapprove of legally sanctioned gay marriages and 61% disapprove of gay adoption rights. The states of Oregon and Colorado have referendums on this year's ballots which, if passed, will prevent any laws from passing which protect citizens on the basis of sexual orientation (for jobs, lodging, etc.)! Perhaps if bisexual and homosexual groups like FLAG&B were less militant in nature, more of these people would be understanding to their cause.

This emergence of a "politically correct" or "anything goes" mentality in campus, and for that matter, across the nation is extremely dangerous. Our nation is not a police-state; no one has the right to tell anyone else how to think or what to believe on a particular issue, including homosexuality. It is wrong to condemn someone or label them a "neo-Nazi" for having a rigid moral code. Reference can be made to an event which occurred this past summer involving an interview with Dan Quayle. The reporter asked about his view of homosexuality. Dan Quayle said that he thought it was wrong, and the reporter immediately responded, "Aren't you gay bashing?" Come on people, isn't it about time that we stop labeling every adverse statement to homosexuality as a personal attack?x

In summary, America needs to wake up and recognize that some people still believe that absolutes exist. Morality is not a relative term depending on the day and age one lives in. Homophobia is a serious issue. However, we feel that groups such as FLAG&B are damaging their own cause by inflaming, and not understanding the student body at large.

Track teams express concern with schedule

TO THE EDITOR:

This letter is being written as a unified effort of the Bucknell Women's and Men's Track and Field teams concerning a matter of utmost urgency. Restructuring BU's academic calendar will undoubtedly have far reaching ramifications across campus. One area where these scheduling alterations will have a decidedly negative impact on our BU experience will be Bison Track and Field competition. Under the proposed calendar, our outdoor Patriot League Championship Meet directly conflicts with Final Exams. Consequently, adhering to Bucknell's academic policies means that our teams would be prohibited from participating.

Sentiments of confusion and dissatisfaction were expressed teamwide once this realization was made by our coaching staff. We wondered how the University's planning committees could have possibly overlooked such a conflict in scheduling. Their proposed calendar denies our 110 athletes a chance to compete against Patriot League competition in what is perhaps the most important meet of our season. Year-round workout programs designed by our coaching staff have Outdoor Championships as the main objective. A good performance at that meet can qualify an athlete for Eastern Championships and a chance to strive for national prominence at the NCAA Championship Meet. Without that conference meet, eight-plus months of preparation are practically pointless. This situation presents even more bitter irony when one considers Track and Field's success here at Bucknell. Our teams have enjoyed numerous conference titles and post season honors; team success has also played an integral role in BU's stranglehold over the coveted President's Cup.

Academically, Bucknell's Track athletes share a tradition of unmatched excellence. Such achievements have been due in no small part to the environment afforded by the now defunct January Term. Our squad, as well as other winter sports, has been able to pursue long distance competition without threats of missed classes and study conflicts. January's former scheduling conveniences allowed for increased athletic focus, which in turn facilitated greater academic balance second semester. This is evidenced by our 3.2 cumulative team GPA.

The impending ratification of calendar restructuring carries with it dire consequences for mem-

Student highlights abundance of choices at Bucknell, reaction to The Princeton Review

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in response to the article on the Princeton Review in October 23, 1992 paper. I find it extremely aggravating to constantly hear that there is nothing else to do at Bucknell, so we drink. I'm not saying that people don't drink at Bucknell, I am just tired of hearing people blame their drinking on the "school in the middle of nowhere." I don't understand why a student would tell a national guidebook on colleges that "I know it is a state law, but without drinking there is no social life at Bucknell." Is this self-sabotage? The opportunities that Bucknell makes available to it's students are extensive. We have had speakers and performers from all over the world, in all areas of life come to talk and perform for us. Also, Bucknell is equipped with many facilities. For example, the craft shop and the field house. There is a wide range of organizations on campus too, from the Photo Club to the Equestrian Team.

Maybe it is the fact that I am from a suburb of Boston, that makes me so interested in the culture and environment in which Bucknell is situated. I think many Bucknell students take for granted the unique area in which we live. A trip to the farmers market, or out in either direction on Route 45 is evidence enough. The usual phenomena of "criticize that which is different" is wide spread in our Bucknell community.

What more can Bucknell do than to present the opportunities to us. They can't force us to attend these performances, or to immerse ourselves in middle Pennsylvanian culture. You get what you make of life. So take some pride in the excellent school you attend and take some responsibility to learn about the environment in which you live.

Student calls for common courtesy after fire alarm activation

TO THE EDITOR:

The official story as it probably appears in the Security Log: At 2 a.m. Sunday morning some unknown person(s) did pull a fire alarm in Smith Hall for no apparent reason.

This is the story from my perspective-I was tired, cold, and sick when I called it a day early Saturday night. I'd been feeling miserable all day and all I wanted to do was get some rest. I had just slipped into oblivion when the alarm went off at 3 a.m., or the second 2 a.m. if I had changed the clocks. My first thought was could I get away with it? But I said no, I'd better go out just in case. The wind chill was about minus three hundred. A friend from 1A came over and said that it had been pulled in their hallway by someone running through. We were not happy campers. I didn't get back to sleep again for quite some time. (It didn't help that a drunk person called me at 4 a.m. but that's another story.)

Now, I know that nighttime fire drills are a reality on every college campus on earth. And I know I'm lucky I don't live in Vedder or Roberts where fire alarms are weekly activi-

Students urged to look beyond bubble when voting

BY MEG WICKMAN

I first heard the term "Bucknell Bubble" as a prospective. I remember smiling and nodding in agreement, but my unspoken reaction was, "What is she talking about?" After all, this was a student who said that she loved it here. Now, as a senior, I know only too well what she meant. I suppose the kind of insulation that "bubble" implies is inevitable whenever a group of people live, work and socialize together. Bucknell is my world while I'm here, and any problems I may have seem to take on a cosmic significance. I find myself forgetting about the vast majority of people who have no connection to the University. It's as if they don't exist.

There's no better way to remind yourself of the world outside Bucknell than to enter back into it. This past weekend I traveled to another campus for a conference. As soon as we drove into campus, we sensed that it was very different than the place we had just left. This may seem obvious, but I was struck by how easily we were able to hypothesize about the college's climate within minutes of arrival. Throughout the weekend, I was surrounded by people who just didn't seem "Bucknell." I had forgotten how accustomed I had become to this place.

I don't think this fact is anything to be ashamed of; after all, the students I observed were probably living in their own version of the bubble. However, it's important to remember that we are all part of a larger whole. The biggest danger of living in an insular community of any sort is forgetting our responsibilities to the larger world that we have never really left. For instance, when we vote we are choosing someone who will not only affect our own lives but those of millions of other people.

Again, this fact may seem obvious. But it has apparently been forgotten by some members of the campus community. It disturbs me to overhear people discussing who will provide them with the best tax breaks, etc. The harsh reality is that many Bucknellians would be able to pay a few more taxes without starving. This is not the case for millions of other Americans. (Of course, this is a theoretical example, since the major candidates are promising to raise taxes, if at all, for only a bare minimum of the population.) Don't get me wrong: it's important to look out for your own well-being, and that is why politicians try to simultaneously please as many people as possible. Self-interest becomes a problem only if the good of the larger society is ignored. Will the policies that help you also be beneficial for those who need assistance more desperately?

I don't presume to tell you who to vote for. That decision must be yours and yours alone. Perhaps the person to best serve you is also the best candidate for the rest of the country. As educated individuals, we should be able to use this education to help us make a decision. Keep in mind your understanding of our society and its needs. Take your conscience with you into the voting booth.

Student blasts Princeton Review as superficial and biased

BY J. RYAN DURKIN

I recently read something in The Bucknellian which disturbed me quite deeply. Bucknell was rated as number one in the "lots of hard alcohol" category and third in the "lots of beer" category by the "oh so respectable" and widely read Princeton Review of colleges. Who could possibly take serious a publication which rates schools according to "Lots of sex", "Party Schools", and "Go Greek"? Why is our administration concerned with these superficial publications? The very fact that the Bucknellian printed this drivel on the front page below an important article on our nation's budget dilemma is asinine.

Bucknell is hardly the party school our reputation makes us out to be. I see more people at the library on so-called "party nights" than I ever see standing around a keg of beer somewhere downtown. Lately it seems everyone at this school has given up the ritual chugfests and group vomitting for a good seat in the third floor hard-core study area in the library. These days, the "throats" at this school aren't the ones gulping and throwing up beer. They've been replaced by "throats" who spend endless nights in the Mac Labs.

Perhaps the most ridiculous description the Princeton Review has given Bucknell is the rating as first in hard alcohol. This is an atrocious and totally unfounded charge to level against us. Could you imagine if your parents had read that when you were a senior in high school applying to Bucknell? I'd like to know who responded to this "survey" the Princeton Review conducted. This certainly does not reflect the views of the entire campus. Reading a review like that, most people would visualize this school as a group of bourbon slugging idiots who are all working on getting a graduate degree from the Betty Ford Clinic.

Reading a review like that, most people would visualize this school as a group of bourbon slugging idiots who are all working on getting a graduate degree from the Betty Ford Clinic.

I personally don't really care what the Princeton Review publishes about Bucknell. Their publications, in my opinion, are little more than emergency toilet paper. I mean, who actually benefited from their sad books on how to beat the S.A.Ts? The fact, however, is that many uninformed individuals do give their publications credence. What I think we really have to examine is the mindset of the imbeciles who answered their "survey". Common sense would tell you it's best that you say positive things about the university you attend. And more should have been published in the Bucknellian about the positive reflections on Bucknell in the "survey." Although I really believe this "survey" was geared toward creating negative stereotypes of colleges. Therefore, when one is presented with such a survey, use common sense in responding. I consider myself a normal Bucknellian and resent the fact that some fool can categorize me as an alcohol guzzling screwoff by answering an already biased "survey." Perhaps a small group of confused individuals can truly describe this school as nothing more than a constant sauce-fest. Most of us, however, do not want to be categorized by their opinions and descriptions. Not to sound cliche, but the old adage, "a few bad apples..." applies here. So even if you do pride yourself on being an alcoholic, think about the rest of the student body before you answer any more" surveys.

STREET BEAT: How have STD's affected sexual practices on the BU campus?

BY TRACI MELLINGER '95

DON STECHSCHULTE
Director Student Health Services

"From my position, I see total disregard and denial that STD's even exist on this campus; an assumption that is dead wrong. Many students are playing Russian roulette with five loaded barrels. Many of the students on campus today will not be alive for their tenth Bucknell reunion."

KATHLEEN PARKS GR
Master of Science in Education

"Drunk or sober? When sober I think that people try to be more careful and practice safer sex. However, most sex is concurrent with alcohol which inhibits rational thought and practice."

CHRISTOPHER TACKNEY '93
Economics

"There is definetly an increased awareness and concern. Most people are more careful about "random hook-ups" and condom use is definetly a high priority with students."

KIRSTEN OLEAN '94
Political Science & Spanish

"Unfortunately, I don't think people think much about STD's until they jump into bed with someone. Bucknell has worked to educate us—hopefully people are being more careful and using a condom."

ROZ YANNACONE
Nurse Practioner for Gyn. Services

"I feel that there is an awareness of STD risks in the student population, but that understanding does not transfer to behavior changes. In fact, overall students are having more sexual partners which puts them at a greater risk."

BECKY HARLAN '95
Elementary Education

"I hope that it has increased-condom use and other safe sex practices."

OPINIONS

What is the role of social issues in the election?

BY JOHN STITH

Compare 20th-Century United States to Europe in the Middle Ages, and you begin to realize what a society is. Our society includes the philosophies, culture, laws, and economics of our time. When we debate how the government should act to guide society (through civil rights legislation, abortion decisions, economic action, etc.), we call this debate a social issue.

My first point is that economic issues are social issues as well. The basic question behind economic issues is how we should distribute wealth. This in every way is an issue of society.

The Republican, Democratic, and Perot economic plans are all sold in the name of providing long-term economic growth. But consider the three sets of social effects which the three plans will produce. Will one benefit the rich and another the poor? Will one give power to big business and another to workers? These questions concern how we continually restructure our society—this is social policy.

So, economic issues are important to society, to how everyone lives. Still, major candidates are spending an inordinate amount of time debating the details of economic implemenation, rather than identifying what the goals of our societal change should be. They're debating what some people term mid-level issues, rather than high-level issues, which also need to be discussed.

Ironically, Mr. Quayle has taken us closer to discussing a major societal issue than anyone. In talking about what "family values" are, Quayle has pushed presidential politics perilously close to something that really seems to have nudged put it. Mr. Gore's environmental proposals, too, have brought up issues concerning the future of our society.

But presidential candidates (and most Senatorial candidates) have shied away from these heady topics back to the safe zone of mid-level issues. They know if they talk about the deepest challenges of our society—the family, abortion, racism, homosexuality, sexism, the role of women, economic justice—they run the risk of losing votes. These vital issues were virtually brushed aside in the presidential debates.

This nees for major candidates to be moderate is not only built into our system but is a legacy of recent events. The polarization over the abortion issue is, unfortunately, ruining our chances to have national discussions on the greatest issues our society faces. People believe the myth that there's nothing more to say, when Americans are truly thinking so much more than they're saying. The only groups talking about the "true issues" listed above are the far left and the far right. Americans in the middle, including most politicians, just aren't speaking up.

So, what is the current state of social issues? The candidates are talking about short-term economic issues at the expense of other social challenges. The future of our society is not a advantageous thing to discuss. The results: progress on minority rights is slowing to a standstill, the animosity between liberals and conservatives is deepening, and we have an increasingly fragmented society, due to all these arguments which are getting nowhere.

We need to talk about the tough social issues, in our homes and schools and media and political forums. The many sides need to be honest about what they want our society to be in the future. The social issues of our time will not be solved by rhetoric, but by honest talk and understanding.

(Comments on the national scene by Teresa Amott, associate professor of economics, and Patricia Misciagno, assitant professor of political science, in the "Political Participation by Women" discussion on October 20, were very helpful in the writing of this piece.

Other ideas came from a very good commentary on abortion issues and their effects on American society: Life Itself, by essayist Roger Rosenblatt. It is a new book and in the library.)

United States foreign policy is un-American

CRISTINA M. TISA

You and I are citizens of what I believe to be the greatest nation in the world. Theoretically, we can rise from poverty to wealth, believe in our own god(s), and express our political philosophies without fear of reprisal. We are the global champions of democracy, and we are envied by every nation. Or are we?

We preach self-determination for everyone, but we practice otherwise. The United States government is notorious for disrupting the natural political or economic progressions of numerous Third World nations. Our military has, under orders, installed puppet governments in almost every Latin American country possible (Nicaragua and Panama are the most notorious of all examples). Why? Because it is the American way to maximize profit. We've become greedy, and have forgotten our glorious and liberal history.

> How would Locke view our government for its injustices? For that matter, how would he view the American people for tolerating them? I can only imagine his anger and frustration at how we have twisted and manipulated his precious ideas.

The following passage, a modified version of Lockean thought written by Thomas Jefferson in 1776, should be a blatant reminder.

We hold these Truths to be self-evident, that all Men are created equal, that they are endowed with certain unalienable Rights, that among there are Life, Liberty, and the Pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these Rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their Just Powers from the Consent of the Governed, that whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these Ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government.

Have we come to apply these words only to ourselves? Is America the only nation allowed to enjoy freedom and self determination? It would seem so. It is imbedded in our foreign policy to invade and restructure any country or region that decides to determine a different path to prosperity and stability from our own. In our arrogance we have decided that capitalism is the only acceptable economic philosophy, and democracy is the only "right" method of government. These interpretations are essentially against what Locke held as utterly universal.

He was not commissioned by our Founding Fathers to write a noble document that would justify our radical revolution. He wrote with the belief that all men are subject to a peaceful and rational state of nature. The ultimate power of every government lies in the hands of the people who contracted it. Locke's philosophy is not exclusive to America. We adopted this philosophy into our government because we felt that Locke was right; and his ideas noble, just, and credible.

All men are created equal. Not only the white, Anglo-Saxon Protestants that constitute most of our nation. Those words mean that every Ibo, Somaale, Mayan, Indochinan, Croatian, Nicaraguan, and Brazilian has the right to expect the same liberties we do. They have the right to revolt against any government who oppresses them, and reneged on their human freedoms; even if America will lose money on the deal. In fact, Locke would argue that they have a moral obligation to revolt because their government breached the contract agreed upon by consensus.

We commit a crime every time we interfere with the will of the people in any given country. What would George Washington, who urged our nation to avoid international intervention and alliances, say to our military, or Congress, as they prepare to engage rebel armies in Nicaragua? How would Locke view our government for its injustices? For that matter, how would he view the American people for tolerating them? I can only imagine his anger and frustration at how we have twisted and manipulated his precious ideas.

The things this country used to stand for are still inherent in every American. We are deluded by society from birth to believe that the United States is the "white knight" riding into foreign battle to save a people from oppression. In truth we are the knight that fights to preserve the status quo. We are brainwashed to believe that American imperialism is for the good of the colonized. In truth we exploit, suppress, manipulate, and destroy any parcel of land we touch.

I hadn't thought that John Locke's treatises were so difficult to understand, but I see that I've been a victim of skillful conditioning; convinced that our elected leaders embrace and implement these ideas on a universal basis.

I still have faith that we can lead our country into the moral and just society envisioned by John Locke. We must embrace all that he has written, and not fall victim to complacency. As Locke would say: "Reverie is when ideas float in our mind without regard of the understanding." It is time to end the righteous rhetoric and begin a new speech.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

First-year runner objects to schedule changes

TO THE EDITOR:

I am Jim Heizman, a freshman and a recruited member of the track team. I am writing to you to voice my objection to the faculty's recent decsion to adopt a recalendaring plan.

Professor Marsh states that this plan will let Bucknell offer instructional periods equal to those of our "frame of reference schools." The committee used facts such as: allowing honors students three weeks to complete individual projects, giving professors time to prepare work, and the pushing of the spring sports season into periods of better weather, as justification to adopt this plan.

Vice-president Barbara Shailor asked the committee whether they realized that changing the calendar has a detrimental effect on the spring sports programs. Professor Marsh replied that if Bucknell's "frame of reference schools" could do it, so could Bucknell. Vice-president Shailor then quickly pointed out that these schools, like Colgate and Lehigh, did so by sacrificing their students' participation in championship games and meets. In a short meeting on Tuesday, the track team was told that this recalendaring plan would eliminate Bucknell athletes from participating in the conference championships eight out of the next ten years. This is not fair to the students involved.

This decision has a deeper rooted effect then just not enabling students to participate in some top collegiate sports programs. The more successful the program, the bigger the draw. Take the track team as an example. Bucknell's track program is one of the most dominating in the country, and at the same time posts a better than 3.0 GPA team wide. So you see the sports programs attract academically as well as athletically gifted students. If you eliminate the biggest meets and games of the season, you in effect, rip the hearts out of the sports programs. The appeal of these programs are lost and there is no longer anything to shoot for, so the programs die. This results in a loss of interest in Bucknell as a whole. Now student/athletes capable of attaining 3.0 GPA's or better won't apply to an institution without sports, and the legacy of a high quality academically as well as athletically balanced institution comes to a close.

It was also stated by Professor Marsh that "this is a compromise between student preference to move back and faculty preference, even requirement, to have time to prepare to teach" (The Bucknellian, 10/16/92, p. 2). I don't know of any athlete that would support a recalendaring of the year if it meant eliminating championships. If the Jan Plan wasn't eliminated, there would be a whole month to take care of these things, but that is a different issue.

I hope you will consider my objection, as one of many student/athletes who strongly object to this plan. And I hope something can be done to rectify it. Thank you for your valuable time.

Without consideration for the demands placed on us as student athletes, Bucknell's proposed schedule will deny 110 high caliber runners, sprinters, jumpers, throwers, vaulters, and hurdlers a chance to prove that Bucknell is indeed a unique institution where athletic excellence coexists with academic prowess. We hope to have alerted attention to this urgent situation and opened up possibilities for schedule adjustment.

To whomever is responsible: Maybe you thought you were proving how incredibly cool you are. Maybe you did it as a "non-hazing" activity in which case I hope you consider depledging. Maybe you did it because you think it's a fun thing to do, in which case I hope you consider psych services. Not only did you piss off a hundred or so people, but you broke both Bucknell and Federal fire equipment statutes and you endangered the lives of everyone since every false alarm reduces the integrity of the alarm system. You don't think fire alarms should be taken seriously? Talk to any TKE or SPE brother.

I'd love to hunt you down and strangle you, but I'll offer this alternative. If you really want to impress someone, step forward and apologize, even anonymously. And grow up.

The singular lives of Jordan and Marsden

An interview with Mary Jordan '93 and Valerie K. Marsden '93, the leading male actresses in The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs

In the department of theatre and dance's production of The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs by Simone Benmussa, Albert Nobbs (Valerie K. Marden) and Hubert Page (Mary Jordan) are two women pretending to be men. Set in 19th century Victorian Ireland, the play comments on the society and gender roles of the time. No male actors are ever seen on stage, providing a unique position for the female leads.

Albert Nobbs will be performed tonight through Sunday night. Tickets are $4 and available at the door. Performance starts at 8:00.

Brian Sipes–The Bucknellian

Mary Jordan '93 and Valerie K. Marsden '93 star in The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs. Playing women disguised as men in the male-dominated Victorian society, the actresses discuss their experience of playing 'perhapsers' on stage.

Q: What's it been like portraying women pretending to be men?

VM: Well, the hard thing about it is, you find out that you're a woman playing a man so instantly you want to forget the woman and just do big male characteristics like hand stroking the chin, hand in the pocket, a swagger, a very confident walk, attitude, deepening your voice. But it's not that. If you think how a man is feeling then it will show. That was difficult for us. But I think it's showing and the femininity is still there, so it's not a group characteristic. With this play, because it's so emotional and deep, you have to work from the inside out. That was the biggest challenge because it's too easy to just go for the generalizations.

MJ: At first it was really weird. Because, well, to state the obvious, I'm not a guy. I mean, I was a tomboy for a long time so it's not that hard. The thing about us is that it's not that we're playing men. The fact that we're playing women playing men means that we should retain a bit of femininity but yet we can't be too feminine. Gary [Grant, chair of the department of theatre and dance, and director of Nobbs] said it himself, 'you're women, we know this. So now be men.' But yet we have to retain some of our femininity because it's inherent. It's a funny thing.

Q: Mary, your character is much more masculine and much more extroverted than Albert Nobbs. Is that easier or harder to play on stage?

MJ: I thought it was easy until about a week ago. I started finding that I didn't know if I was stereotyping the masculine image that we all get when you imitate a guy. I mean I was walking with my legs way apart and I was sort of acting like half the guys I know. I realized that it's harder than that because I was playing it from the outside in for a long time. I haven't been acting long enough to think from the inside out immediately, so my initial want is to just go for stereotypes. And finally I realized that the reason I was frustrated with the work I was doing with Hubert Page was that it didn't mean anything to me. So I had to sit down and think, okay, I'm not a man saying these monologues, I'm a woman saying these monologues and I've got to look at them from a woman's point of view, not from a man's point of view. Because the funny thing about my character is she's a woman on the inside, but she's been playing a man for so long she simply physicalizes masculinity. It's really not an internal process for her. But she's convinced enough people for fifteen or whatever years that she is a man so that I think she sometimes believes herself that she is one.

Q: What kind of role models did you base your characters on?

VM: Usually I draw from something I see in film, but I didn't have a specific image in mind. The text is so rich in character detail, from what the character says and from what other people say about the character, that I got a good idea of what Albert was about just from interpreting that. I also base her on my own life. I mean, I had a long period of time where I had short hair, glasses, I'd go into a department with my mother and the saleslady would be like, can I help you and your son find anything? So because I was never as feminine or as cute as everyone else, and also being a theater person, I know what it's like to feel that differentness. I was a tomboy also and many more of my friends are male than female, so I understand the masculine side.

Q: You mention that as a theater major you understand what it is like to be a little bit different. What kind of reaction are you expecting from the rest of the campus?

VM: Well I'm hoping because people are supposedly becoming more 'PC' that they'll be open to the idea of the homosexuality in the play, although it's not real homosexuality. It's more confusion, because Albert has no real gender base or desire base as to what she wants–a man or a woman. I think people may be a little shocked. I'm hoping it will cause a little bit of a stir around some people, maybe make them feel uncomfortable. Because if they've been made to feel that way it means they're thinking.

Marsden and Jordan confront each other with their own hidden sexuality in this all-important opening scene. Jordan's confession leads Marsden to question the path her own life has taken.

Q: Mary, your character is actually married to another woman, but the text never discusses whether you live together in a very close friendship, or if there is a sexual relationship between you and your wife. How did you envision Hubert's relationship to her wife?

MJ: That was one of the first things I worked out about my character. And it occurred to me, for reasons unknown to myself, that Hubert is having a lesbian relationship with her wife.

Q: How does that affect your character?

MJ: It makes her more masculine and stronger. In my mind I don't think the relationship started off that way. But I think that's what it's come down to. Which is why I think my final monologue, where I try to work things out for myself, is so confusing to me. Because I'm really trying to work out my femininity, or lack thereof.

Q: The last line of the play is spoken by a man, Alec (Mark Minsavage '94). The line reads, "A woman that marries another woman and lives happily with her isn't a natural woman. There must be something of the fairy in her." How does that affect your character since he is essentially referring to Hubert?

MJ: I listen to that every night when Mark says it and it makes my conflict that much greater because I finish by saying, what story am I going to tell my family who I left fifteen years ago. What excuse can I come up with that they'll believe. And it hits home because I realize that a man isn't going to understand why I left. It's only natural that Alec reacts that way because, again, he's a man and he thinks differently. Women had a certain place in society back then which frankly I don't think has changed a whole lot. And guys don't get it. If a woman does something completely on her own, a man who is used to having a woman there to depend on him for whatever reason isn't going to fathom a woman saying, well now it's my turn to take care of myself. And I go away and do that. That's why it's such a struggle for me at the end of the play to decide whether or not I'm really going to go back home.

Q: What about Albert? Albert courts another woman, Helen Dawes (Jessica Alexander '95), with the prospect of marrying her. Do you think that Albert's intentions are purely business, as the play suggests, or do you think she has sexual intentions as well.

VM: Well Gary talked about this, that there are some lesbian undertones. I am physically attracted to her because I've supposedly been a man for 25 years. Before that I was in love with a man, and nothing ever came out of that. I don't think I have a real basis of who or what I'm attracted to. And here I am thinking that, yeah, I could get married to a woman because it would be conventional by society. I could keep my man role and my job at the hotel, where I'm a waiter, and I think Helen comes into the picture and I do find her physically attractive. Yet mostly I just want company. I don't know how sexual it is. Not that much. It's more comfort I'm seeking in a female sensitive companion.

> If this interview and the talk about the lesbian undertones bothers anyone, then it's a must to come see (the play) and learn what human beings are all about. . .
> —Mary Jordan '93

Q: What kind of prep work do you do for your character?

VM: I just think about it. I think about the opening monologue in which I talk about my life as a bastard, and I just think about what it would be like to grow up belonging to no one, being a 'perhapser.' That's the big word for me. It means being stuck between the sexes. Just being stuck in my own unique sexuality. I have no one, I don't even have a gender to base my life on.

MJ: It's funny, my character's so much different. I come into the play without the intention of revealing my sexuality to anybody. So I don't really have to prepare other than to just start walking like a guy five minutes before rehearsal starts. I revert back to my volleyball days and I remember how I used to walk then. I've had to practice sitting with my knees apart and it's weird. That sort of thing. But, it's much easier for me because the revelation comes to me in the course of the play that I'm going to reveal my sexuality and I allow that to come to me as it happens on stage. I don't bother with it before rehearsal starts.

Q: So you're doing it from a much more physical perspective?

MJ: Yes, and because I come on stage without any intention of saying it, I'm also relying on Val as Albert to draw it out of me. And that works.

Q: What have you gotten from this experience? This is not your typical role.

MJ: I've done Juliet, I've done all these oh-so-feminine roles. It's been fun. Because how often does a woman get to play a really strong, masculine, outgoing physical role? I'm a house-painter. I'm a physical person. And it's good work for me because I'm a physical person as a human being. It's been interesting because to play such a physical character in such an intellectual play it's been really hard to control myself. My instincts are to pat Val on the back every now and then and to really get into being a physical character and I've had to hold back. But I think that Hubert would have had to have held back too in reality. And it's taught me a lot of ways to open up on stage.

VM: This is the most work I've ever done on a production. I take it home with me. I think about it, I dream about it, I work on it so hard. This is the most challenging thing I've ever done. Not just because I'm playing a man, but because I am so vulnerable in what I have to reveal, and it's not just my chest, it's everything that I say, every gesture, it's so emotional. It's basically flat out rejection, one after the other. And the fact that I have to do that in front of 300 people, whether they're critics or friends, is extremely hard to do. I just have to trust them and trust myself to carry it off.

Q: How much of yourself do see in Albert Nobbs?

VM: A lot. I see a lot of myself, but there are some things to it. Like when I'm acting confident and gallant on stage, I've never really been that way. I do see a lot of it. I mean I've got so many experiences I can draw on for it.

Q: Hubert has only two scenes in the play. Yet he is really one the central characters. Why does that happen?

MJ: Well, it's funny because my two scenes are in the very beginning and the very end of the play. And I think that's why that happened because in the very beginning I come on and I affect this person's life and then I go away for seven years and then I come back and my being there is the reason. And I don't want to sound like a pompous jerk, but Hubert's being there is the reason Albert gets into the rest of the play. Without Hubert ever coming in there wouldn't be a play. Because when I come on stage, after her sexuality is revealed to me, I reveal mine to her and I say, look this is my story, I'm married and I have this great life and then I have to go away because I'm a working man, I have a job to do. And then she tries to figure out if maybe she's been living her life the wrong way.

Q: There are two chambermaids on stage (Joanna Fassl '95 and Vanessa Jones '95). They never have any lines. What role do you see them serving in the play?

VM: I see them as Albert's alter ego. They're her feminine counterparts. They're what she could have ended up as if she hadn't become a waiter. I think every other character represents a possibility of what I could have become if Albert hadn't become Albert. They're a physical reminder of what she could have been. Albert still has feminine feelings, even though she's tried to forget about them. You can't just completely throw yourself into another gender.

Q: What's been the experience of working with an all-female cast?

MJ: It's really been a good learning experience.

VM: Oh, it's been fantastic.

MJ: And I've learned a lot from Gary in playing a guy, too. Because of the way that men look at things, we've had to take an entirely different approach to everything from how we normally would. Because how does a guy think? Guys think so twisted, it's weird.

Q: What about the fact that the play is basically framed by two men? We never see man on stage and yet the story is told by a man speaking off stage. What's the perspective on that?

MJ: There are two completely different men narrating this story. The storyteller, George Moore (Paul Heimer '93), is more sensitive to the circumstances because when he was a little boy, perhaps not too much younger than Alec himself, he was in this hotel, meeting these people, not understanding. He grew up and he heard about what happened to the characters. He heard about the plight of the characters, and I think because George comes from a much higher class background than Alec does, a bit of understanding came with his maturity and his education. Alec simply isn't mature enough to be sensitive. So it's funny, there's a sort of tennis match off stage between these two men. George will say a line and Alec will say, "Well, what's wrong?" And Alec will be the pessimist and the cynic and George will come back and say, "But you have to understand." He'll smooth things over and try to make Alec understand that this really was a horrible situation for these women, that it really is sad and it really is difficult and the fact that they went out and tried to better themselves, more power to them for that. And Alec is still probably living with his mom and used to women waiting on him hand and foot. And what else is he supposed to think? It's hard for them, I'm sure, as actors, to pull that off. Especially off stage.

Q: How do you think this play would be different if it were directed by a woman?

MJ: It depends on the woman. But most women directors I know would have made it very clear from the very beginning that there are definite lesbian undertones, whereas it took Gary a long time because he was looking at it from a man's point of view. I think a woman would have been much more straightforward about it from the beginning. Because when I read the play I saw lesbian undertones immediately. There was no real question in my mind until Gary raised it, and then I thought more about it.

Q: Any last comments?

VM: It's the most beautiful, wonderful, amazing story. Come see it for the story itself.

MJ: If this interview and the talk about the lesbian undertones bothers anyone, then it's a must to come see it and learn what human beings are about. And what women are about. There's a lot to be learned from this play. There's something to be learned by everyone. The most liberal and the most conservative will really get a lot out of it in different ways. I think that it's a very politically and socially important play.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

Ringing and singing all night long

BY CHRIS BIRD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The music department will present its Parents Weekend concert this evening in Rooke Chapel at 8:30 p.m. The concert is free and seating is unreserved.

The Rooke Chapel Ringers, under the direction of Dr. William Payn, associate professor of music, will open the program. Among the pieces to be performed will be the debut of Centennary, written by Payn himself.

Tonight's concert will mark the first for the Ringers since the group's tour of New England last May.

Following the Rooke Chapel Ringers will be the Rooke Chapel Choir, conducted by Payn. David Cover will accompany the group on the piano and organ. The choir will be performing Bobby McFerrin's arrangement of The 23rd Psalm and the traditional spiritual Swing Low, Sweet Chariot. The ensemble will offer a preview of their upcoming Candlelight Christmas program with Still, Still, Still, arranged by Norman Luboff, and A Babe is Born by William Mathias.

Members of the choir will also be featured as student conductors. Jon Caponegro '94 will lead the group in Non Nobis, Domine, by William Byrd. Dale Grothenhuis' Song of the Triumph will be conducted by Amy Anderson '94.

The final ensemble to perform will be the Bucknell University Concert Chorale, again led by Payn and accompanied by Cover. Among the pieces to be performed will be Hielig by Mendelssohn, Persichetti's Song of Peace, and selection from The Unicorn, the Gorgon and thr Manticore, both by Menotti.

The chorale will feature soloists Amy Anderson '94 and Lisa Toccafondi '96 in "Regina Coeli" from Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana. The Concert Chorale will end the program with the familiar Joshua Fought the Battle of Jericho.

All three groups will remain busy until the end of the semester. The Chapel Choir, which last week had its final recording session for a compact disc to be distributed nationally by Albany Records in the fall of 1993, will be joined by the Chapel Ringers for their nationally acclaimed Candlelight Christmas Service.

This year the service will be held on December 5, 6, 7, and 9 at 7:30 p.m. in Rooke Chapel. The service, which was televised around the country last year by PBS, is a holiday extravaganza that you won't want to miss.

The Concert Chorale will have two performances before the end of the semester. On November 21, the chorale will perform with the Bucknell Opera Company in the Weis Center. November 22 the group is slated to hold a solo concert in the Weis Center.

Payn, who conducts all three ensembles, has nothing but praise for his musicians. "We lost a number of seniors to graduation and juniors going abroad this year," said Payn, "and we have more freshman in the groups than in the past three years. This freshman class is a wonderful class and has quickly become a part of the ensembles. I know that this is also a tribute to the upperclassmen who have helped and enjoyed performing with the freshmen."

Payn feels that the Parents Weekend concert is a wonderful first concert for the season. He encourages all parents to see not only their children's talent in the music department, but in the theatre and dance and art departments as well.

Payn said, "As I continue at Bucknell, I have a growing appreciation and understanding for the necessity of the arts in our world."

Painting for painting's sake

The work of Kathy Hafer. On the left is a painting titled "Deliberation" for which Hafer recently won several awards. On the right is a self portrait. An unsung talent on campus, Hafer, in addition to being a talented artist, also coaches the women's rugby team.

BY KRISTIE ANN ROBSON
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Even when I was going through school I was doing portraits to help pay the rent and pay the bills...I never really had the chance to just do what I want... I look forward to the day when I can get up and say, what do I want to paint... I am more driven by those kind of paintings."

Kathy Hafer, Bucknell's Women's Rugby coach, has recently received honors from both the Lewisburg Festival of the Arts Juried Show and the York Art Associaton Juried Show for a painting that she "wanted to do." Her dynamic personality and talent not only touches the hearts of the players she coaches, but her "other" side is now receiving the recognition it well deserves.

Hafer grew up in Lewisburg surrounded by the simple ideal that "everybody is here for you." Her motivation has been rooted in the numerous teachers and acquaintances that have said, "Look at your work Kathy; you're going to make it."

She never really aspired to be a painter—sports and music took up most of her time when she was growing up. It was not until a teacher in high school said, "You know there are careers in art," that Hafer decided to pursue her childhood entertainment.

A straight-A high school student, Hafer went to college as an art major, "not even knowing if I could do it." She first attended Elmira College in New York but then transferred to the Antonelli Institute of Art and Photography once she was sure that art would be her career. She became inspired by the works of Rembrant and Singer-Sergeant.

Her heart led her to painting even when professors were advising against the "path of the starving artist." In the year off from Antonelli, she came in contact with Bucknell Rugby.

If you have ever seen Hafer play rugby you know how incredibly hard it is to picture her first asking, "What's rugby?" But she did ask that question twelve years ago. After taking a year off, Hafer went to the Ducret School of Art in Plainfield New Jersey.

Her professors wanted her to go on to the Academy in New York City, but financial difficulties prevented the continuation of schooling. She returned to the area with the intent of working and saving money to eventually move on to New York. Most of her time was spent working in restaurants bartending.

It was in her spare time that she was able to do some portraits. As her portrait clientele grew, more time could be directed to painting. But there was still not enough time to do mostly her own work.

Her recent painting "Deliberation" was one of the first paintings she was able to do for herself. The correlation between her life and the painting is easy to make—with time Hafer's own work will find its merit.

Her philosophy concerning her own art asks: "Am I painting what I feel and getting that feeling back from my painting?" She likes her paintings to be a place or a feeling to which the observer can relate.

"One of the biggest compliments I ever recieved was from a woman who said, 'That painting says something to me. I can feel something when I look at that painting,'" said Hafer.

Fellow rugby player Julie Grammont '93 described Hafer as "a dedicated, active, patient, and intense coach...but also a lot of fun too. She works hard but still gets along really well with others."

Hafer describes herself as simply "just me." That "just me" includes a never ending smile and bundle of energy that powers her work and inspires those she comes in contact with in everyday life and through her art.

ISO Dance tumbles into Weis Center

Bucknell University will present a performance by ISO Dance tomorrow night at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. The performace features a zany, offbeat approach to modern gymnastics. Tickets are $15 ($5 with BUID) and available from the Weis Center Box Office.

The Italian presses called Iso Dance "ephermeral, intelligent, subtle, surreal, and visionary." The source of this high praise will display their talents tomorrow night on the Weis Center Stage. Tickets are $15 ($5 with BUID), available at the Weis Center Box office. The show will start at 8 p.m.

The program for the evening will include music by Philip Glass, Talking Heads, and all John Lennon and Paul McCartney pieces will be performed by the a capella group the BOBS.

Founded in 1986, ISO Dance's resume includes performances throughout the United States, Europe, South America, and Japan. In 1988, the group began collaborating with the BOBS. Last year the two companies were commissioned by the Matrix Midland Festival in Michigan to produce an original program.

Beyond stage performances, ISO Dance has been the subject of two PBS television specials. One of the programs, Episodes for KCET in Los Angeles, won five area Emmy Awards.

Individually and as a collaborative ensemble, the company has created choreography for the major rock tours of David Bowie and Paula Abdul. Their film credits include Wild Orchid, Bram Stoker's Dracula, and music videos for Sting, U2, The Neville Brothers, Rod Stewart, Simply Red, and Pat Metheny.

"The music is an eclectic blend of contemporary and classical, including Debussy, Ravel, Dan Hicks, and the Bulgarian Women's Radio and Television Choir, and the evening reflects ISO's trademark humor and off-kilter approach to dance and the stage," said William Boswell, director of cultural events. ISO Dance features "a zany, offbeat approach to modern gymnastic dance." Boswell guarantees that you'll be entertained.

One of the more recent developments in the entertainment world here at Bucknell was the donation of a Steinway Grand Piano. Donated to the Weis Center by Mrs. Janet Weis, the piano is considered to be one of the best in its kind.

With such generosity to the Bucknell community, it makes one wonder who these benefactors are. Many alumni and citizens of the community have been generous in their philanthrophy to Bucknell...

Along with the Weis Center, there are many other buildings named for certain people in Bucknell's past. Let us begin with the most basic of names: Bucknell. Our campus was christened with this name for William T. Bucknell, a benefactor of the University, trustee from 1846-1863, and then Chairman of the Board of Trustees from 1882-1890. A large benefactor, Bucknell contributed towards the building of the observatory, Bucknell Cottage, and the original Chemistry buildings.

The wind blows lilacs out of the east. And it isn't lilac season. And I am walking the street in front of St. Francis Cathedral in Santa Fe, from Denver. Oh, and it's a few years eariler and more. That's how you tell real time. It is here, it is there. The lilacs have taken over everything: the sky, the narrow streets, my shoulders, my lips. I talk lilac. —From "Santa Fe" by Joy Harjo

Native American writer and educator Joy Harjo will give a reading in Bucknell Hall tonight at 7 p.m. A member of the Muscogee (Creek) tribe of Oklahoma, Harjo writes of the current status of Native Americans as well as their treatment in the past.

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The tormented poet, the mysterious artist, the struggling minority—Joy Harjo represents all of these. Reluctant to speak about her past, Harjo's work speaks in languages that words cannot.

Patricia Shifferd, professor at Northland College, said of Harjo's reading, "the beautiful phrases came alive as she read them, evoking the mood and imagery as they floated through the auditorium."

Bucknell will have the rare opportunity to experience Harjo's inner voice when she gives a poetry reading tonight in Bucknell Hall. The reading will begin at 7 p.m. and is free and open to the public.

Harjo was born in Tulsa, Oklahoma in 1951 and is a member of the Muscogee (Creek) Tribe. Her works addresses the current status of Native Americans and their treatment in the past, as well as her own personal experiences.

Extremely concerned with her heritage, Harjo is sensitive about addressing problems that can arise from her ethnicity. She realizes, too, that being light-skinned, "I can pass (for white) easily, and sometimes I think, you know, this is too hard. It would be easier to not be Indian at all. It's hard enough to be one or the other, and it's harder to be both."

Being Indian is, "very tiring and painful and frustrating and sad and angering, given the history," said Harjo. "I'm not trying to bitch and whine and groan because the other side of that is a lot of incredible beauty and insight."

Harjo also recognizes the dicotomy in the way that Native Americans are connected to the land. She states that while the philosophy of Indians draws no separation between people and nature, "I don't like this romanticization of Indian people in which Indian people are looked at as spiritual saviors, as people who have always taken care of the land. We're human beings. But I think different cultures have developed different aspects of humanness."

Born into a troubled and poverty-stricken household, Harjo shies from speaking about that section of her life. At 16, she began attending the Institute of American Indian Arts in Santa Fe.

"I was lucky to end up going to school there," said Harjo. "In a way it saved me. I think if it hadn't intervened, I probably wouldn't have lived very long. I mean, it's hard being an adolescent, but I had a lot of wars going on at home."

But although Harjo is reluctant to speak about her past, she claims to draw on her experiences to fuel her poetry. "There's a sort of ecstatic sadness. It's not always sadness, but there's a point of letting go at which I know what I can do what I want, and it feels good, and I'm playing, I'm touching language, and I'm touching places I haven't touched before."

After graduating from the University of Mexico with a BA in poetry, Harjo received an MFA in creative writing from the University of Iowa. She also attended the Anthropology Film Center in Santa Fe.

A prolific writer, Harjo has authored four books, She Had Some Horses, What Moon Drove Me to This?, The Last Song, and her latest, In Mad Love and War. Much of her poetry is also included into various anthologies.

Selected as Outstanding Woman of the Year in 1978 and 1984, Harjo has won several awards for her poetry. Among the various distinctions, Harjo placed first in the Academy of American Poetry Award, University of New Mexico in 1977; first at the Writers' Forum, University of Colorado in 1977; received a National Endowment for the Arts Creative Writing Fellowship, and more recently won the Pushcart Prize Anthology in Poetry in 1988.

Harjo is an associate professor in the department of English at the University of Arizona, Tuscon. She also sits on the Board of Directors for the Native American Broadcasting Consortium and is on the Steering Committee of the En'owkin Centre International School of Writing (for Native American writers.) Harjo is a member of various literary and minority associations, and has received extensive residencies for writing.

In addition to being a poet, Harjo is an accomplished dramatic screenwriter. She has produced no less than six screenplays including Apache Mountain Spirits for Silver-cloud Video Productions. Harjo also plays saxophone with her band.

A veteran at poetry readings and workshops, Harjo has traveled extensively around the country sharing her work. She prefers reading her poetry, rather than having people read it. "There's a lot of leeway for lying (in written works), because when you have something written down, you can't look at the person, you're not looking at the person's eyes, you're not in the person's presence," said Harjo.

Widely acclaimed for the energy and emotions she inspires while reading, Harjo's performance tonight should be exceptional. Her style is typically unpredictable and intense, like her poetry.

"I think a poem has to have a huge amount of risk, and it has to have some danger, because there's danger in the universe," said Harjo.

Harjo's visit to Bucknell is cosponsored by the Association for the Arts, the Columbian Quincentennial Fund, the Multicultural, Race/Gender, Women's Resource, and Writing centers, and the Stadler Center for Poetry.

Alcohol has a stronger effect on women

KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

At college, perhaps more than anywhere else, drinking alcohol is a focus of many students' lives. It seems to walk hand in hand with the tradition of the university—the two have long been established as a right of passage for young people into adulthood.

Much of the drinking that occurs on college campuses is social. Drinking a round of beers with your friends after a tough work week, going out to a party, or just sitting in a room with a bottle of wine and a few friends are common ways that allow people to loosen up, let go of inhibitions for a time and to interact with others in an enjoyable environment.

It is only recently that the number of male and female drinkers has become almost equal. But while male drinking is widely condoned throughout most cultures, drinking by females has serious societal ramifications. Women also have unique physiological reactions.

Due to a lower proportion of body water, alcohol is less diluted in a woman's system; an equal amount of alcohol will have a greater effect on a woman than on a man regardless of size. Therefore in peer pressure situations where women are encouraged to drink large amounts of alcohol, the blood alcohol level (BAL) can become dangerously high, causing blackouts and, ultimately, loss of control.

This loss of control due to a high BAL impairs a person's judgement and, besides the obvious dangers of an alcohol overdose, can be a very adangerous situation. Remarked Bucknell alcohol educator Bob Thomas, "When a woman is drunk to the point of blacking out she could engage in dangerous sexual behavior, ending up with someone and not remembering who that person was or even what happened. By not knowing that person's history she has put herself in a very risky situation." Added Janice Butler, head of the Women's Resource Center (WRC), "Drinking to the point of intoxication is risky behavior for women because they become easy targets for some people to take advantage of."

After a woman experiences a lost evening and realizes that she has indeed had sexual relations with someone, chances are that she might experience some guilt feelings or feel a need to evaluate the role which alcohol plays in her life.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Studies indicate that women have more problems than men do drinking. Women get drunk quicker because of low body water.

Psychological Services can provide a ready and confidential outlet for anyone who needs to discuss a possible alcohol problem. "I think it's important for women not to blame themselves so much when there wasn't sensitivity on the male's part," commented pyschologist Rosaria Gabriele. "Just because a woman drinks doesn't mean that she should end up hurt."

Women should be aware of another physical ramification of drinking: alcohol metabolizes more quickly in females than in males. Alcohol is delivered to the liver quicker, causing a female drinker more damage than her male counterpart. So even if a woman has been drinking less over a shorter period of time than a man, permanent organic damage—cirrhosis of the liver—is likely to occur.

Many of the issues which revolve around alcohol abuse, problems with self-esteem, academic problems and relationship difficulties, seem to become cyclic in their causes and effects. "A person may have difficulty interacting with others," commented Gabriele. "And she might turn to alcohol as a solution in order to become more comfortable around people. But the woman may begin to think of alcohol as the only possible way to interact with others and eventually become dependent on alcohol in order to escape her real self-esteem problems."

Ironically, most relationship difficulties occur not because the woman has an alcohol problem, but her partner may be an abusive drinker. In addition to Psych Services, a consultation with Bob Thomas, or aid from the Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition organization (SWIT), all of which maintain complete confidentiality, the Women's Resource Center can help a woman who is involved in an abusive relationship by presenting a woman's options and resources should she decide to seek assistance with the problem. "We try to help a woman understand what she can and cannot control in a relationship," said Butler. "And most of the time the victim doesn't want to leave the relationship, she just wants to stop being hurt. We ask her to consider how the abuser would respond to counselling, but ultimately the final decision about what will happen to the abuser comes from the victim."

Added Thomas, "I try to make anyone who chooses to come to me comfortable and establish trust in that whatever is shared is confidential. I'm there to help so that a person may become productive again."

This is not to say, however, that all women drinkers are slated to become alcoholics or victims of opportunists; many women drink socially without experiencing any problems. But studies show that certain groups of women do have a stronger tendency toward alcoholism than others.

Drinking is intended to be an enjoyable, social event; it should not be a traumatic event for people. But if problems do arise, it is important to remember that a woman always has resources to which she can turn.

Facts about alcohol and women

Alcohol reduces the secretion of sex hormones, and when combined with medications containing estrogen (such as birth control pills), may cause a longer hangover period than men. —National Clearinghouse for Alcohol Information.

Alcohol increases a woman's risk of breast cancer and menstrual and circulatory disorders. —Women's Action Alliance

Women make up mearly 35 percent of Alcoholics Anonymous membership lists. — Alcoholics Anonymous

Women frequently use other drugs in combination with alcohol, placing themselves at higher risk of physical and psychological impairment. About 51 percen of female AA members, as compared to 41 percent of male members, reported addiction to another drug.—Alcoholics Anonymous

Women are now heavily targeted for marketing of alcoholic beverages. Women will spend $30 billion on alcohol in 1994, compared to $20 billion in 1984.

What the Health is Going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER AND LISA LIPARI
Bucknellian Staff Writers

How do you know if someone is an alcoholic?

Common signs of alcoholism are drinking to "cope," drinking too frequently to intoxication, drinking when you have class or when you have to drive somewhere, doing things while you are drunk that you would never do while sober, "blackouts" (temporary loss of memory), or shaky hands the morning after drinking.

An alcoholic problem is basically a loss of control over one's own drinking, and each case is diagnosed separately by a physician, psychiatrist or other therapist.

How are proofs determined?

The "proof" of an alcohol is determined by doubling the percent alcohol in a particular liquor. On the average, American beer contains 4% alcohol, wines 10-12%, and distilled beverages (whiskey, scotch, gin, vodka, etc.) 40-50% (80-100 proof).

How does alcohol work in the body?

When you drink alcohol, 20% is immediately absorbed into the bloodstream, where it is carried to the brain and slows down brain activity. The other 80% is processed slightly slower through the gastrointestinal tract and then goes into the bloodstream.

Alcohol first affects self-control, then causes loss of inhibitions (you talk and act more freely). Next come impairment of memory, coordination and balance. Further consumption severely impairs judgement and perception. If steady, heavy drinking continues, the brain will become anesthetized, and coma or death may result.

What happened to the myth that a drink a day is good for you?

This myth is not in existence any longer. In the past, doctors would prescribe a drink to cure nerve and stress ailments, thus making a person less anxious. It has actually been found that drinking is detrimental to your health, so a drink a day is not a good idea. Try an apple instead.

Is alcoholism inherited?

Alcoholism runs in families, but this does not mean it is hereditary. Writing poetry and voting for Democrats may run in families, but it is not hereditary. Today, alcoholism is caused by both heredity and the environment. Donald Goodman, M.D. states, "a gene is a unit of heredity. It is a specific set of chemical instructions stored in every cell which call for specific chemical events, resulting in specific inherited traits." Yet, few inherited traits are produced by genes, so most inherited traits and illness are caused by more than one gene. This presents problems. Thus, a person with the disease never knows s/he is an alcoholic until s/he takes a certain drug. They do not have the disease until the symptoms appear. So, in alcoholism, even if it is hereditary, an environmental trigger, alcohol, has to be introduced in order to develop a problem.

If you drink for enjoyment, here are a few alternatives to alcoholic beverages which are just as fun:

Salty Puppy
*Salt rim of 9 oz. glass
*Fill glass with 1 scoop crushed ice
*3 oz. freshly squeezed grapefruit juice
*Splash club soda
*Garnish with grapefruit wedge and mint

Tomato Bull
*Salt rim of 10 oz. glass
*Fill glass with ice cubes
*Squeeze and drop in 1 fresh lemon wedge
*Squeeze and drop in 1 fresh lime wedge
*Fill with Bloody Mary mix
*Garnish with celery stick

If you have any questions or concerns about alcoholism, please call Bob Thomas, coordinator of drug and alcohol programs, at 524-1401.

Problems with alcohol? Seek help on campus

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If a Bucknellian has an alcohol problem, he or she does not need to look very far to find help. There are several organizations on campus to help students having problems with alcohol.

Psychological Services offers students individual counseling, usually on a weekly basis, according to the director, Arlene Hoyt. Students can, with the help of a staff psychologist, learn to identify the nature of their problem and what prompts them to drink, as well as the repercussions of alcohol abuse. The office also offers literature that gives information about alcohol and its effects. "We deal with a lot of students from families with alcohol problems," Hoyt said. "Many times we refer students to support groups on and off campus such as Alcoholics Anonymous and Adult Children of Alcoholics." Hoyt noted that all counseling services are confidential.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Does your trash can look like this by the end of the weekend?

Robert Thomas, Coordinator of Drug and Alcohol Programs, handles drug and alcohol counseling at the Student Health Service. As with Psychological Services, all counseling offered is confidential.

When student come to Thomas for help, they are asked to fill out a questionnaire dealing with aspects of the problem. Hopefully, the student will be honest about the nature of the problem so that proper treatment can begin. "Denial really interferes with the ability to get effective treatment," Thomas said. "Basically what I do in the initial interview is to try to make the person feel comfortable, that I'm here to help and not to hinder." Many students become socially, as opposed to physically, addicted to alcohol. Thomas provides some education about things students can expect if the pattern of use continues. "Initially what I'm trying to do is establish a trust with the person that they can benefit from being here."

Thomas usually sees a student for as many sessions as needed in order to get back into a productive mode. Alcohol abuse and other drug abuse may interfere with a person's academic pursuits because the social life which revolves around alcohol has become more important than the actual academic work. Thomas tries to redirect those energies and point out that these patterns are counterproductive to the student's education.

"I find that the students who are beyond just an occasional problem use stage, who are beginning to develop an early psychological or physical dependence on alcohol, will tend to deny more that it's affecting them." At this point, Thomas must rely on the help of the people in the system outside, such as faculty and friends, to monitor the student's behavior so the student does not continue to abuse the drug.

Larry Larson '93 takes an unexpected nap after a night of drinking.

Friends play a large part in the role of helping students deal with alcohol problems. If a student is concerned about a friend's use of alcohol, they are welcome to make an appointment with Thomas to discuss the problem and possible solutions. "They can come in here and they don't even have to give me the person's name. All they have to do is say, 'These are the signs and symptoms, these are the behaviors I'm seeing, what do you think?' I explain to them what I think they should do, steps they can take, to confront that person and talk about what that person's behavior is, and how their personality or behavior changes when they're under the influence of alcohol."

If a student is concerned about his or her drinking, there are many ways for them to tell if their alcohol use might be a problem. "I think that anybody who has made the choice to drink and finds that any problems that they're having are the result of abusive drinking would indicate that they are at least a problem drinker." The CAGE test is one form of questionnaire that can give a student an idea of whether or not his or her drinking is a problem.

"As Jean Kilbourne said, and as I said, about ten percent of those people who drink alcohol become alcoholic drinkers. That's not to say that the huge percentage of students who experience problems because of their drinking are alcoholic, said Thomas. " I would say that 40-50% of the drinkers at some point in their college career (or wherever they started drinking) will experience problems directly related to their alcohol abuse . . . The focus has to be on fun without alcohol. They think alcohol is going to make them have a better time or if they need it to have a good time."

Thomas added, "People are not labeled when they come see me. They can talk about their behaviors and talk about how they're feeling, and if alcohol is adversely affecting their life in any way, we can try to determine what they can do to change that behavior and improve how they feel and their chances for success as a student. I don't want anyone to have to leave Bucknell or have a bad experience at Bucknell because of the abuse of a drug."

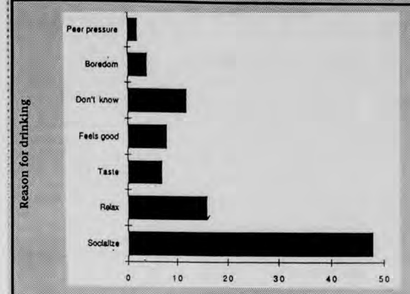
Campus drinking trends well above the national average



BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

We've all had national statistics about college students drinking drilled into us at one time or another, but how do Bucknellians actually rate against the numbers? According to a poll taken by The Bucknellian, students at Bucknell drink more per week than the national average.

The national average indicates that 42% of college students engage in what is called "binge drinking," consuming five or more drinks in one sitting within a week. Fifty-two percent of the students at Bucknell engage in the same type of binge drinking every week.

The percentage of students who drink between one and five drinks per week is 46. The Bucknellian survey further concluded that 90% of the students at Bucknell drink, while a mere 9% do not.

So, what do 51% of Bucknellians drink? Only that fresh brewed mountain water called beer. The more daring drinkers (38%) said they drank both liquor and beer. A mere 9% said they drank liquor alone.

Of the drinkers polled, most (34%) said they drank only one day a week. Thirty percent said they drank two days per week and 24% said they drank 3 days per week. Ten percent of the pollees said they drank 4 or more days a week.

Fraternities came in first (44%) for places to go to appease the drinking habits of students on campus. Twenty-eight percent said that dorm rooms, apartment parties, and bars were the places to go to drink. Eight percent said a combination of all four places was the best bet for a buzz. The remaining 3% said they did their drinking only at home.

Reasons for drinking ranged from enhancing social skills to boredom. Of the drinkers, most cited that their motive in drinking was to relax, have a good time and let loose. One responder said, "Damn, that's philosophical. I guess I never really thought about it." Only seven percent said they drank because they liked the taste of beer. Ten percent of the students who drank had no reason for drinking. Another student noted that his reason for drinking was because, "It (college) is the only time in my life that I can get away with it (drinking) because of the relatively safe environment.

While 62% of the students said they did enjoy drinking enough to say that they liked it, some 20% said they did not like drinking. Sixteen percent said they were unsure of whether or not they liked to drink.

So when and where did these drinking habits form? Despite what many believe, most of the drinking started at home and not at college. An astounding 75% of the students who consume alcohol said that their home environment was conducive to drinking. Fifty-five percent of the drinkers said that they started drinking between the ages of 15 and 17. Fourteen percent said they started drinking at 14 years old or younger, while 24% said they started at age 18.

Whatever the reason for such high consumption rates, Bucknellians are known to drink. Given the fact that college students drink, and will continue to drink for a long time, it is left up to the individual student to decide whether or not he will drink.

Boredom fuels drinking on campus

Study finds relation between the size of a campus and amount of drinking

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What signifies the end of the school week for you? Slamming the door behind you after your last class, slamming your book closed after a few Friday afternoon hours in the library, or slamming your first few beers of the weekend? A recent study conducted by researchers from Southern Illinois University and the College of William and Mary suggests that Bucknellians would be apt to symbolize the onset of the weekends with drinking.

The study, reported in the Sept. 20th issue of The New York Times, states that students at small colleges with a population of less than 2,500 drink more alcohol (seven drinks a week on average) than their colleagues at larger schools of over 20,000 (4.59 drinks a week). The survey of more than 56,000 students at four-year schools and community colleges attributes the heavier drinking of small school students to the rural settings where they are usually located, and tend to lack off-campus alternatives to drinking. Students at these schools are said to drink heavily because of their "tendency to conform to existing social norms," says the study.

Along the lines of this study is the rating given to Bucknell in the new Princeton Review Student Access Guide to the Best Colleges, which placed the University first in the "Lots of hard liquor" category and third in the "Lots of beer" category.

Bucknell students have mixed reactions to these analyses. Most will agree that heavy drinking is widespread on campus. Some agree with the idea that our location is a strong contributing factor to this behavior. "There really is not much else to do around here," said Terence Riley '94. "If there were more places to go and things to do, maybe people wouldn't drink as much."

But many think small schools in small towns are not the only places where this occurs. "I have friends who go to large schools in large cities, and they don't necessarily use all the social outlets the downtowns provide, which puts them in the same boat as Bucknell students. The people I know drink like fish" said Jen Smolko '93.

"People drink at schools everywhere. College is just known as a time when a lot of people drink a lot," said another student.

Stacy Hopkins '93 agrees. "I have friends at larger schools in cities who go out much more and drink at least as much as people do here. They all drink heavily at pre-parties so they don't have to pay for drinks at the bars. And those that are underage and can't go to bars have to stay on campus, and what they usually do is drink," she said.

Students admit that drinking occurs at Bucknell to some extent because of the need to conform. There is more pressure to act in the socially accepted way at a small school than at a large school where there is enough diversity. Entering a small school, if students see drinking as the norm, they tend to act accordingly.

However, at large schools, although there is less need for conformity, there is still the need to socialize and revel in newfound freedom. Says Maria Glod '93, "I think there are people who drink and people who do not drink on all campuses. I think it just seems like people are drinking more on small campuses because it is more noticeable."

And what about the accusation that Bucknell is number one in hard alcohol consumption? "I don't really think so. People here do drink liquor sometimes, but I don't see it as out of hand. I don't see how it could possibly be enough to give us such a rating," said Rich Stewart, '93. Said Zabet Goldstein '93, "I think people that live in cities buy shots and liquor at bars whereas it is unlikely that people here would find anything more than beer served at parties around campus."

Some people pride themselves that their school is touted as a "party school," but it seems that Bucknellians are wary to accept the implications that such a label brings. Instead of embracing the survey results and the Princeton Review ratings gleefully and considering them grounds for bragging, they prefer to debate any unfound stereotypes the articles might encourage.

"America's oldest , best brewery" nearby

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"We make as much beer as Anheuser-Busch spills in a year," said Joanne Lazusky, director of public relations and advertising for D.G. Yuengling and Sons. However, America's oldest brewery, located an hour and a half away in Pottsville, saw their sales rise 15%, while the "Big Three" of the beer market experienced a two percent drop.

How does this family run brewery operating out of the coal country of Pennsylvania compete with the national brands? They simply don't. Yuengling, which produces six varieties of beer, survived the Depression, Prohibition, and consolidation of the 1980's because as Lazusky emphasized, "We know our limits."

Their boundaries have been steadily expanding, though, as their new varieties of beer have moved out of the bars of rural Central Pennsylvania and into larger markets such as Allentown, Reading, and Philadelphia. Lazusky explained that in the seventies, beer drinkers were concerned with quantity and now because of the concern of drinking and driving, they seek quality. Thus, the more distinctive, richer tasting Lord Chesterfield Ale, Dark-Brewed Porter, Black and Tan, and Traditional American Amber Lager is being requested as far away as New York City, New England, and Virginia.

Brewmaster N. Ray Norbert derives the new beer recipes. Stationed in England as a pilot in World War II, Norbert sampled many a British brew during his tour. While this could be the reason behind many of Yuengling's traditional "Old World" speciality beers, Norbert said, "There was poor quality beer in England during the war." All the master brewers and veteran workers were away from the factories, engaged in the fighting.

Norbert's father was at home in Pottsville, though, mixing and mashing the malts to Yuengling's specifications. It was under his brewmaster father, Zigmunt, that Norbert apprenticed. According to Norbert, "Dad was tough."

Zigmunt Norbert wanted his son not only to know the "secrets" of beermaking, but also the science of it, so he sent his apprentice son to the University of Scranton to take courses in biology, chemistry, and physics. With his science background, the younger Norbert could have easily become either a brewmaster or a doctor or dentist as he at first thought he might like to be.

While his father taught him the guidelines of brewing beer, the Brewer's School in Manhattan, one of two such schools in the nation, taught Norbert all the changing mechanics of brewing, turning the Pottsville native into a true "beer engineer." According to Norbert, "Everything is down to a science." Essentially

To keep abreast of the changes in the beer industry, Norbert maintains membership in the Association of Brewers. Each year the experts in the beer world, which today include chemists and microbiologists as well as the beer connoisseurs, gather in Colorado to discuss the latest technology. Through these conferences and tours of other breweries, Norbert has discovered that while different brands of beers may possess different aromas, fluctuating flavors, and varying heads of foam, they are all essentially produced by the same method. The discovery of pasteurization insured this set recipe.

Yuengling beer is more likely than its national competitors to be consistent in taste, bottle for bottle, case for case, keg for keg. This is because Yuengling brews only two batches of beer a day, while the competitors produce hundreds, in a dozen different plants across the country.

The barley and hops for the big beers are grown on farms from Nebraska to Idaho. The mash tubs are all built during different years and contain varying amounts of stainless steel. All these factors alter the taste and color of the beer slightly. To insure consistency and to guarantee that the Yuengling recipe is right, brewmaster Norbert samples his company's beer every Tuesday and Thursday.

As more of the Eastern seaboard samples and switches to Yuengling's variations of America's favorite yeast product, the company can continue to tilt towards operating at full capacity. With ten new fermentation vats, the company can now produce up to 200,000 barrels (6,200,000 gallons) of beer a year.

Expansion will stop there though, as Yuengling outrightly refuses to open a new plant outside of Pottsville. Knowing their limits has paid off in the past however, as 163 years later, Yuengling remains only one of twenty major breweries in the United States. In 1890, 2156 breweries existed in America.

In 1992 Yuengling's remains not only "America's oldest," but also one of the best, or as Jen Yuengling '93 would insist, "the best."

D.G. Yuengling & Son
America's Oldest Brewery

D.G. Yuengling and Son brewery is the oldest in America and they've got a museum to prove it.

Founded in 1829, by German immigrant David G. Yuengling, the brewery is still operating and expanding. Five generations after its start, it produces 163,000 barrels of beer (8,153,000 gallons) a year. While the beer is still produced in the same plant that it was fermented in 161 years ago, the company now brews six varieties of its product.

Tours of the 163 year-old brewery are offered every weekday at 10 a.m. and 1:30 p.m. Brewing kettles, fermentation vats, and tunnels carved out of the mountainside, which were used for refrigeration decades ago, can be seen.

Tours end in the taproom, where the Yuengling line may be tapped. Yuengling Premium beer is a regional favorite. Yuengling Premium Light beer, which was introduced four years ago, contains only 98 calories. Brewed with zestier hops, the Lord Chesterfield Ale likes to be associated with the European imports. The Traditional American Amber Lager is reminiscent of turn of the century beers. Dark-Brewed Porter, of which Yuengling is the largest producer in the country, blends caramel and dark roasted malts to give it a full-bodied, dark taste. The Black and Tan, which is often referred to as Half and Half, combines porter and beer for its unique flavor. Available only on draft this year, it must be sampled in the taproom or at local Schuylkill County bars.

Answering machines add subtle message

Owning an answering machine in college is an essential to campus life, and a creative way to reveal the true essence of the receiver

BY HEATHER DOHERTY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

"Howdy! You've reached the Garth Brooks bait, tackle, ammunition and gift shop at 523-0001. Neither Steve nor Ty are here right now to take your call because we're out ropin' steers, and drinkin' some beers and the maybe eatin' a little fried Dixie Chicken.

Said with a slight Southern twang and ending with a rousing bit of Garth Brooks hit Dixie Chicken, cartoonist Steve McNutt's '95 answering machine message sets a clear example of how a message can reveal the personality of the message-maker. McNutt's satirical nature shines through his message, illustrating to any caller that the person being called is a down-home, tongue-in-cheek humorist.

Messages on answering machines vary widely, as with the personality of the people who own them. Some answering machine owners go for the simple, straightforward approach, as in the basic "Hi, this is Bob's room. I can't come to the phone right now, but leave a message and I'll get back to you." While this announcement gets the point across, it lacks the excitement uniqueness and the opportunity to shock or amuse the caller.

Other students are more original in their greetings. The more creative student will sometimes use random clips from a favorite movie like Monty Python's and the Holy Grail or some other cult classic. The announcements are often esoteric and callers may be confused when they don't hear exactly whose room it is. However, the idea is entertaining because the callers get to listen to obscure and sometimes even enlightening messages.

Another popular answering machine technique is using music. The idea conveys not only the personality of the person being called, but also their taste in music. People who use Metallica on their machines are probably different from those who leave Mozart to greet their callers. Music is rather original, but the music never records as well as one would hope, and it usually comes out too loud and distorted

One of the more annoying messages is when the machine plays a "Hello" and it sounds like someone picked up. Seniors often find that after three years of deliberating over the best answering machine message, the prospect of unemployment becomes a priority, and the message changes to "Hello. You have reached 523-0002. The hard-working, devoted, witty, and willing-to-work-for-peanuts student that resides here is out studying to become a more productive citizen. Please leave your name and a job offer at the beep."

No matter what kind of message is used, an answering machine is a vital part of a college students paraphernalia. "Nothing is more aggravating than trying to get in touch with someone who is always out and does not own an answering machine," said Caroline Boag '95. An essential to college life, answering machines allow a student to get messages those life and death, urgent phone calls that otherwise would have been missed.

Yet another great feature of having an answering machines is being able to screen calls. Though not particularly polite to pick up the phone after the caller has identified himself, it is a great way to avoid that annoying nerd from econ class that keeps calling. Using an answering machine to screen calls, however, has its downfall. It is even more painful to let the phone ring until the machine picks up the call, and then have the caller hang up.

Even though answering machines are a necessity to college students, the point is defeated if callers don't leave messages. Hang-ups are a heart-breaking part of owning an answering machine. A major blow to the ego is coming home to an empty room and seeing the little light on the machine blinking four times, only to find out that there is only one message and three hang-ups. Every answering machine owner has wondered who the hang-up caller was. Questions like, "Was it just mom and dad, or was it Ed McMahon telling me that I won a million dollars?" always bring that edge of doubt and wish that they had been in the room to receive the call.

So why don't people leave messages when they call and reach a machine instead of a real person? "There is just something so artificial about answering machines," complains Sharon Martell '94. People sometimes feel dumb talking to a machine because they think that they sound ridiculous. Other times they're taken off guard and just don't know what to say.

Bob Reynolds '91, Weis Center box office coordinator, has his own way of dealing with answering machines. Instead of stammering through a boring, spur-of-the-moment message, he hangs up so he can "sit down, write out a little script of what I'm going to say, and make it really funny." Reynolds will then call them back to leave his message. This way both the caller and the person being called can get an original message.

Perhaps the only thing worse than hang-ups is coming home after long day to find no messages on the machine. This can only bring attention to the fact that no one wants to talk to you which leads you to wonder if the purchase of an answering machine was a wise thing for your damaged self-esteem. Don't despair, just tell yourself that the machine must be broken and remember this despair the next time you are tempted to hang up on another's machine.

Lightfoot Inn lacks flavor and service

BY SCOTT DONALDSON AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

As if paying our dinner bill at the Thomas Lightfoot Inn wasn't painful enough, we had to waste a good four dollars in gas money and an hour in time to reach its locale outside of Williamsport. Needless to say, we won't readily venture down Route 220 to this historical inn again in our collegiate careers. Both the food and service at the former plantation and stop of the Underground railroad were disappointing.

The appearance of this old Quaker inn was inviting enough. A large, early American type house with candle lit windows and Williamsburgish decor greeted us and set us in the mood for a night of colonial cooking.

After glancing at the menu, Susan insisted upon ordering both the baked Brie with apples, walnuts, and french bread ($6.50) and the Shrimp Lightfoot Inn ($6.50), which was advertised as "jumbo shrimp wrapped in bacon and baked in a spicy sweet and sour sauce." Scott didn't argue about this selection of appetizers as he had never sampled any shrimp that he did not like and he knew that Susan loved Brie.

However, Susan didn't eat an eighth of this wheel of Brie. It wasn't melted enough to easily spread upon the rather Italian looking bread and did not even taste proper when lumped upon the apple slices. Overall, the taste wasn't worth the wasted cholesterol.

We did not fight over the shrimp either. Neither of us hollered, "Mine," for the last piece, for the sweet and sour sauce reeked of vinegar. Susan actually coughed both times she attempted to eat the appetizer.

The New England clam chowder ($1.75 per cup/$2.25 per bowl), which was served before the appetizers, (was it quicker to heat up?) was good. In fact, after quickly devouring it, we were sure that we would want a repeat meal at this restaurant. The chowder was full of clam and potato chunks and tasted slightly garlicky (in Susan's opinion) and just spicy enough (in Scott's opinion). Dinner, which was served directly following the appetizers, (are you as confused as we were about what we were to receive next?), varied in quality according to entree. Scott's main course of fettucini with fresh sea scallops, shrimps, and clams in a white wine and basil sauce ($14.50) tasted fine. It wasn't something that he would request the next time his mom cooked him a special meal, but it tasted good and was satisfying. Susan's baked salmon in a puff pastry with lobster sauce ($16) was just okay. Besides the sauce being a pumpkin color (lobster meat is off-white, isn't it?), Scott remarked that it was "fishy." Susan wanted to say that something was worth recommending, though, so she didn't agree with him—at least not right away. However, she refused the server's offer to have the rest of her meal wrapped.

While the volcano pie dessert (a brownie/chocolate sauce/nut conglomeration) was delicious, it couldn't redeem the rest of the meal or our server's attitude or speed. Water glasses and iced teas were often left unfilled for often lengthy periods of time and three tables were reset while we sat for 15 minutes with finished dinner plates in front of our faces. A smile or two upon our server's face might have helped, but we did not witness one until we ordered dessert (tip time?).

Except for the atmosphere and the clam chowder, the evening was a disappointing drive.

The Thomas Lightfoot Inn is located at 2887 South Reach Road off of Route 20 South, Williamsport. Call 326-6396 for reservations.

Where can you buy Native American art, handmade rugs and tapestries from Guatemala and a variety of trendy and environmentally oriented tee shirts and gifts? Until the middle of August, the answer might have been, "Maybe New York? or Philidelphia?" Now, however, one need not roam any farther than Market Street to a small store called Señor Frog.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Señor Frog—the latest Bucknellian clothier on Market Street.

Opened in late August, Señor Frog is owned and run by a resident of Lewisburg, Tammy Winters. "I thought there was a need for this type of store in town, one which has a little bit of everything from a variety of places around the world, as well as from the US."

Indeed, the shop is filled with earthy, natural and environmentally-conscious types of products—a low-scale Nature Store, if you will, but with lower prices. Clay pottery lines the shelves, framed nature scenes dot the walls and racks of hand-woven cotton clothing suggest that global consciousness has spread—even to Lewisburg.

"I think that the items appeal to a variety of people," commented Winters. "Bucknell students as well as residents of Lewisburg have come in to see what the store is all about. I think most people do like what we have to offer, especially since there's such a variety of things to choose from."

Señor Frog is located at 214 Market Street, towards the Lewisburg Hotel.

Sexual confusion on campus

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Do Bucknellians of the opposite sex send mixed signals? Apparently so, because a study done on this topic at Bucknell was printed in the October 1992 issue of Playboy magazine. The study was carried out by former Professor of Psychology, Chris O'Sullivan and students Gretchen Althoff '90 and Samantha Anderson '90 in 1990.

The study found several interesting facts concerning relations between males and females on campus, such as:

Seventy-one percent of the men said they had misunderstood a woman's friendship as a sign of sexual interest; 48 % of the women made the same mistake with a man.

Fifty-eight percent of the men said they felt a woman had intentionally misled them into believing she was sexually attracted to them; 17 % of the women said they felt this about a man.

Seventeen percent of the men said they had intentionally misled a woman; 28% of women pleaded guilty to leading a man on.

The study also appeared in the Chicago Tribune in February 1992.

Men's soccer battles powerhouse PSU

Bison lose to nationally-ranked Nittany Lions in close defensive struggle; plaster inferior squad from Shippensburg

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian StaffWriters

Bucknell's men's soccer team came away from this past week believing that its prospects could not look any brighter for next season. After a 3-1 win over Shippensburg last weekend and a hard-fought 1-0 loss to a tough Penn State team on Tuesday, the Bison (7-8) have to be pleased with their efforts.

Jody Foss—The Bucknellian
Scott Tardibuono '93 searches for answers in vain against Rider in a 4-2 loss earlier this season. Despite receiving limited playing time in 1992, Tardibuono has turned in big dividends for the Bison with three goals and one assist and has provided much-needed leadership.

The team's recent play stood in sharp contrast to last week, when they also tallied a 1-1 record, but were eliminated from Patriot League post-season action.

The two games this week, specifically, served as a sign of hope for the Bison—hope that they could finish the season with a winning record. As leading scorer Greg Beaty '95 remarked, "I think that it's definitely possible. Drexel's always a good game, but we beat them last year and I think we can repeat our success this year. Navy's a tough team, but with all the bad breaks we've had in the league, we deserve to get a few [breaks] ourselves. Maybe Navy's the game... Sure, .500's a good goal."

Bucknell can also look to a promising future. Even with a young team that is still attempting to gel, it has recently showed signs of vast improvement in terms of ball movement and communication.

On Saturday, the Bison seemed more relaxed, possibly because the burden of a less-than-impressive league showing is no longer haunting them. In sharp contrast to the choppy, almost nervous style the team has displayed at times earlier this fall, the Orange and Blue looked as though no team could shake its game.

Talking between the players was the best it had been all year, and the Bison played at a level even better than was expected of them since they were playing a Shippensburg team that was four games under .500.

The Bison scored less than two minutes into the match after capitalizing on a tripping penalty on the Shippensburg keeper. The call was questionable, but the Bison were about due, having endured their share of poor calls this season. Alex Kogan '94, the victim of the foul, put in the direct kick for the first goal.

Despite their strong play overall, the Bison allowed a goal at the 33:24 mark of the first half. It was the team's lone defensive mistake of the game, and stood out only in contrast to the stingy defensive play that the Bison put up for the rest of the match.

Nevertheless, amid confusion in front of the goal on the part of Bucknell's defense, the ball managed to find its way into the back of the home net.

Looking as though he fully expected the ball to be cleared, keeper Mark Wrigley '94 could only watch the shot three-hop lazily into the goal after a Shippensburg forward fired on him. The score was especially annoying for Wrigley, for, had he gotten a normal jump on the ball, it could have been easily saved.

Despite the game-tying goal, the Bison came out with all guns firing in the second half, perhaps to signify that they were not intent on losing yet another heartbreaker.

Defenseman Pete Rodano '95, who was at the top of his game, led an effort that plugged up Shippensburg's offense for the rest of the day.

For the majority of the second half, though, the Bison found themselves facing a team that wanted to win as badly as they did. The opposition clearly smelled an upset, and so Bucknell desperately needed a spark.

With just under twenty minutes remaining in the game, they got that spark, courtesy of Brian Breslin '95. Breslin took advantage of an unforgivable bit of carelessness on the part of two Shippensburg defenders, who were playing the ball back and forth in their own penalty box. Breslin stole the ball, split the opposing backers, and slid the shot past the helpless Shippensburg keeper for a 2-1 lead.

The goal gave the team new life, and from there it dominated until the final whistle. Bo Fifer '94 added

Field hockey moves to .500 after 2-1 week

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In keeping with the Washington, D.C. tradition, Bucknell's field hockey team traveled to the nation's capital last weekend and only got half the job done. There the Bison (8-8-1) earned a split after being shut out 2-0 by American University and then rebounding to beat Georgetown by the same score on Sunday. The squad returned home to host Colgate on Wednesday and was victorious in its eighth overtime contest of the season, 1-0.

Each individual from Bucknell boarded one of the team vans on Saturday, but unfortunately they stepped onto the field against American still as individuals. The Bison just could not pull it together as a group and were blanked, even though midfielder Patricia Way '94 played an excellent game.

"We came out flat," said Steph Carfley '93. "We just didn't play well as a team."

Things got better the following day, however, when Bucknell turned everything around in a 2-0 win over the Georgetown Hoyas.

The Bison took only five minutes of the overtime period to finish off the Raiders.

"We were more into it, more excited, and our passing was much better," said Carfley.

Katrina Mueller '94 added, "We played much better Sunday against Georgetown—we really gave it to them."

Everything seemed to click as the Bison unloaded 34 shots on goal, and everyone played at the top of her game.

"We performed well on the turf, which was a surprise since we hadn't practiced for it," commented Carfley.

Bucknell's scoring began in the first period when Mueller poked an Almira Baldwin '94 pass into the goal.

"She had the ball in the circle," said Mueller, "and she gave me a nice flat pass—I just tapped it in."

In the second period, an assist from Sally Keith '96 led to a goal by Carfley to make the score 2-0. The senior later said, "It was nothing spectacular. There was just kind of a big mess in front of the goal, the ball popped out, and I pushed it back in."

The Bison also exhibited excel-

Bucknell's water polo team was once again on the road last weekend as it traveled to Longbeach, Ca. to compete against the top teams in the country at the annual 49er Tournament.

The squad was given no time to get used to the higher level of competition, though, as the first match of the weekend placed it against fifth-ranked USC.

The Bison (9-10) were overwhelmed from the start and went on to be punished by the high-scoring Trojans, 20-7.

"We were basically outmatched, but I was pleased that we were able to get seven goals off the fifth-ranked team," said coach John Zeiger '91.

The next contest was one that the Bison could have taken, but in the third period they let U-Cal Riverside rally to take a strong lead. The final score amounted to a 10-7 defeat, but Zeigler believed, "We didn't play our best game. They're a team that we could have beaten."

Charmenade College from Hawaii was the third opponent for the Bison but, like the previous match,

Women's soccer sneaks into playoffs

After dropping two out of three, Bucknell claws its way to Patriot League tourney

BY PETER LALOS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

What do being struck by lightning, winning the Pennsylvania lottery, and the women's soccer team making the 1992 Patriot League playoffs all have in common?

Answer: Each occurrence comes against all possible odds.

Yet, after a 1-2 week that rounded out its third year of play, Bucknell's Lady Bison (6-11-1) eeked out the fourth and final position in the league playoffs ahead of Lehigh and Holy Cross.

Following losses to William and Mary and Scranton and a win against St. Francis in the past seven days, the Orange and Blue managed to slip into the tourney at Army tomorrow by the narrowest of margins.

Let's see if all of us can follow this: When this fall's season ended this week, Bucknell, the Crusaders from Holy Cross, and the Lehigh Engineers were all tied at the bottom of the Patriot League standings at 1-4. Then, because the head-to-head tie-breaking solution proved useless since each of these three teams had beaten one another, the decision was made by the goals-allowed yardstick.

Three guesses who won here.

By letting in only eight scores in league play, the Bison finally found a means to scrap their way past Holy Cross (10) and Lehigh (17) for the final seed. Clearly, hats off to Orange and Blue goalie Kim Fekel '93 and the rest of the Bucknell defense for allowing the team a chance to play against the Cadets at West Point.

"We're all very excited about this game because the last time we played Army, we played them really well and their coach said to Toby [Lovecchio, Bucknell's head coach] that we were their best competition all year," said co-captain backer Stephanie Porcaro '93.

Before this exciting news came the team's way, though, it had to face off against three last opponents.

The Lady Bison met up with a powerful William and Mary squad on the road last Saturday and, after the dust had cleared, the playoffs were probably the last thing on their minds. Bucknell was obliterated by its hosts, 9-0, as the team's offensive guns again fell silent.

The game was all but over after William and Mary's Natalie Neaton punched in the game's first three goals, although the scoring festival for her team was far from over. By halftime the count had reached 7-0, and the visitors were left gasping for air.

In the second 45 minutes, the Bison tightened up their defense, but William and Mary still sent in a pair of goals before the end of the match.

On Tuesday, the squad fared significantly better back in Lewisburg but still fell to Scranton in overtime, 3-2. Lisa Gibbons '95 put in Bucknell's first goal just ten minutes into the contest to give the team a 1-0 lead.

Then, after Scranton (12-5-1) scored two answering goals in the second half to take a 2-1 advantage, forward Sara Patiro '95 took a Gibbons pass and knotted the game at two with less than 15 minutes left. There the score stayed until the end of regulation, and the two squads went into overtime.

Scranton forward Kathy Loretanger broke through Bucknell's armor at the 14:32 mark of the extra period, however, and the Bison went down in a painfully close defeat.

Last night the team salvaged the week with a 3-0 thrashing of visiting St. Francis, which should give the Lady Bison some momentum going into the playoffs. Midfielder Joanne Crane '95 stung her opponents with a pair of netters, while Patiro contributed one.

Gibbons added to her impressive numbers in 1992 with two assists.

Tomorrow, Bucknell will enter into a second season that they didn't quite expect to be a part of, but are elated to be involved in. The Bison will be put to the test against number-one seed Army in the opening round, while Colgate and third-seed Lafayette will square off against one another in the second pairing.

"I think that it's a great opportunity for us to play against Army," said Porcaro. "We definitely have a chance—We definitely could win."

The team will have to hope for memorable performances from key players like Gibbons and Fekel in order to defeat the Cadets, but a victory is definitely within Bucknell's means. Even if the squad does happen to fall at West Point, though, it can take pride in a truly admirable performance in 1992, and an unyielding attitude that got them a date against the best team in the Patriot League as well.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

This past Monday afternoon on the Mod fields, Chi Phi defeated Lambda Chi Alpha, 1-0, in the intramural soccer championship game. Dave Newcomb '93 put in the winning goal for Chi Phi, but the real story in the match came when independent presidential candidate Ross Perot stopped by unexpectedly and displayed a latent talent for officiating by refereeing the game. Arkansas governor and Democratic candidate Bill Clinton also entertained the crowd at halftime with a saxophone solo of "Louie Louie," while President Bush did a Dana Carvey imitation before announcing the starting lineups. Talk about a three-ring circus.

the finishing touches to the convincing victory, scoring a goal with two minutes remaining. The junior was assisted by Scott Tardibuono '93.

Coach Craig Reynolds, who was clearly relieved by the victory after last week's debacle against Fordham, made his thoughts apparent to Radano after the game.

"It felt better to win, huh, Pete?" he said wearily to the sophomore backer, who nodded in assent.

On Tuesday, the team traveled to Penn State to combat the highly-touted Nittany Lions. It was a game that looked like a blowout on paper, but that's perhaps why the gentlemen from State College schedule such games. The Bison played their strongest defensive game of the year, allowing only one goal to Penn State, a team that entered the day with a national ranking.

Unfortunately, the Orange and Blue also faced an airtight Lion defense—quite possibly the toughest it has seen all year—and fell by a respectable score of 1-0. The Nittany Lions' backers were absolutely impenetrable, denying the Bison any opportunity to break onto the scoreboard.

However, the same team which may have bowed with less of a fight a month ago against such a tough opponent played with remarkable intensity throughout, and left the field with respect, if not a victory.

The Bison play their final home game of the year tomorrow against the Midshipmen from Navy, which will serve as their final Patriot League match. The season will conclude next Tuesday as the Bison travel to Drexel to face the Dragons.

lent goalkeeping as Danielle Ward '93 and Tracey LaPorte '96 shared the net-minding duties and recorded the shutout.

On Wednesday, the Blue and Orange continued its success—as well as its overtime work—in defeating the Red Raiders of Colgate 1-0 at home.

After 70 minutes of hockey dominated by Bucknell and filled with countless scoring opportunities, the scoreboard still showed two zeroes, and extra play was in order. The Bison took only five minutes of the overtime period to finish off the Raiders, and the goal again came off of the stick of Carfley—her third goal in four games.

"The goalie was out of the goal," explained Carfley, "and Almira shot [the ball] off the goalie's pads. I just pushed it back in."

This turned out to be a very important score, as it boosted Bucknell's record to 2-2 in the Patriot League. Bucknell entered the game—its last league game—in fourth place, and a loss would have dropped the team into fifth. With the win, however, the Bison moved into a tie for second with Lehigh and Holy Cross in the league standings.

Tomorrow is Lewisburg's last chance to catch the women in blue and white in action when they host West Chester. Last year West Chester was ranked 11th in the nation, but Bucknell came through and helped foil their season. Finally, the team will close out its year Nov. 5 at Lock Haven—right around the time the election results should be out.

Overall, the season could not put anything but a smile on coach Rose Ewan's face. Last year the team finished second in the Patriot League Championships, whereas this year it finished first to give Ewan her first-ever conference title.

Diaz pointed to the unity of this year's squad as being its most important asset: "The team was half freshmen, but on the whole we bonded a lot more than last year. Last season, the freshmen felt a little intimidated by the captain, but Kymm did a great job this year, along with coach, and I really didn't feel there was any gap. I think coach was satisfied with our season."

Indeed, Ewan couldn't be happier about her 1992 campaign. The season's achievements included her garnering Coach of the Year honors for the Patriot League and Outstanding Coach of last week's Towson State Tournament, seeing her freshmen run up a mind-boggling string of eighteen consecutive wins, and the team winning ten in a row to start the season before dropping its first match of the season to Seton Hall.

The 25-match winning streak that the Bison put together since last season, additionally, was the third longest in Bucknell history.

Next year promises even more to look forward to. The team will have all of its letter winners returning, since no players from the current team will be lost to graduation.

As the year progressed, one could see a young squad of freshmen mature and prove that they can make a difference—not only against their competition and to their teammates—but most importantly to themselves. With the amount of young talent returning next year there is no telling what this team could do. Running up an undefeated record might be a good guess, though.

Bucknell's PR team: the cheerleaders

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This is the story of the unsung heroes, those who do what they do simply because they love doing it.

This group of 12 people—1 man and 11 women—seeks no rewards nor any pats on the back. I am speaking, of course, about the members of Bucknell's cheerleading team, who take on the task of raising school spirit and cheering for the Bison football and basketball teams each semester. Behind the leadership of coach and advisor Beth Engleman and Co-captains Andrea Larsen '93, Julie Puskar '95, and Charles Curtiss '93 the squad has dedicated itself and its time to supporting the Orange and Blue.

All of the team's women were cheerleaders in high school and continued the activity here at Bucknell for primarily the same reason—the love of the sport.

Casey Corbett '94 explains that "the friendship on the squad" has been the reason that she has enjoyed her experience so far.

"I like getting out and representing our school and showing school spirit," said Jacquelyn Dinielli '93. "I like that we show support for the football and basketball teams."

The only male on the team and the only cheerleader who didn't have any previous experience in the sport before attending Bucknell, Charles Curtiss '93, says that he "did it because it looked like a lot of fun."

Over the last four years, the composition of the team has drastically changed. According to Anne Stephenson '93, a three-year member of the squad, "ten or eleven years ago there used to be full teams of eight men and eight women, and a JV squad of about six." As little as four years ago, additionally, the team consisted of ten men and six women.

Today, however, Curtiss is the team's lone male, and the squad members feel that this is an area that needs to be improved for them to display their full range of talents and abilities.

"I think if we would get more males, since we're losing Charles, we could probably do a lot better stunts," says Stacy Scicchitano '95. "We could probably take the squad up to another level because we have the ability—we just need more guys."

Despite a lack of male participation, the cheerleading squad has showed a great deal of improvement in recent years. "Since I was a freshman the squad has really grown, and with all the new talent it can be a fantastic squad again," says Larsen.

Engleman has had a lot to do with the current success of the team since becoming the its coach and advisor in 1989 after the squad was reassembled at Bucknell. The previous year, the cheerleading team became non-existent due to the fact that it couldn't gain support in any way from the University. This absence of proper backing was evident, because when Davis Gym was renovated that year and bleachers were placed in the area in which the cheerleaders had performed.

Having been a cheerleading coach at the high school level, Engleman took on the formidable task of rebuilding the sport to the level that it has now reached at Bucknell.

"I also think we owe a lot to our coach," said Larsen, "because over the past four years that I've been here the squad has changed every year and she's managed to hold it together. She's done a great job."

Engleman feels that the cheerleading squad serves as Bucknell's public realtions team, since it is highly visible and is usually present at Bison away games.

Theirs, however, is a unit that is widely undervalued.

"We do this because we enjoy it, not because of the social status. We feel like a lot of times we go very unnoticed," said Larsen. While their efforts are seldomly recognized, though, on some occasions they are missed by the athletes whom they support, and that makes all the hard work and the sweat worthwhile.

Around campus the feeling of many students is that cheerleading is silly or boring, but if they took the time to watch the team practice, they would probably change their uninformed views.

"A lot of people don't think that cheerleading is a sport, but really it is," says Jen Cherry '96. "We work just as hard and just as much as all the other athletes—just in a different way."

Cherry's sport, specifically, revolves around timing and practice. When you see these men and women do a stunt in about 30 seconds, you should appreciate it for the many hours of practice that were needed to perform the stunt perfectly.

"This is a dangerous sport," says Engleman. "They [the cheerleaders] are really skilled. They are athletes."

Since the dangerous side of its manoeuvres is well understood, Bucknell has excelled in mastering the sport and the safety measures required to protect its athletes. On Oct. 12, the University's Bison supporters were featured on the TV program Inside Edition as one of the safest cheerleading squads in the country.

However, cheering is not the only thing that this team does.

Tae kwon do club ends first decade at Bucknell

BY KELLY PEET
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Next March, Bucknell's tae kwon do club will be entering its tenth year of teaching members the fine art of offensive and defensive combat techniques. Begun in 1983 by its current advisor, Daniel Rheam '74, the club's enrollment has grown from ten people to nearly fifty in recent years.

The content of the course has grown along with the size, and follows a complete system including stretching; learning forms, a series of choreographed movements with the hands and feet; point fighting; and self-defense. The tae kwon do club is open to both students and faculty, and will stage a Parents' Weekend exhibition tomorrow at 11:30 a.m. on Swartz field. The display will last until the kickoff of Bucknell's football game against the Fordham Rams at 1:00 p.m.

What has made this club so popular over the last decade? Many students begin with the intention to learn self-defense, while others simply point to a fascination for the art.

"It was always a mystery I never understood," says Paul Shawah '93, an advanced red belt who began tae kwon do in the second semester of his freshman year. "I saw a demonstration three years ago at Bucknell and was impressed with how effortlessly an expert could subdue his opponent. Since then, I've realized that tae kwon do resembles more of an art than the typical brawls that you would see in a Bruce Lee movie."

The benefits of tae kwon do, which range from increased flexibility to enhanced concentration and relaxation capabilities, all contribute to reasons why people stay with the art.

"I've gained a lot of self-confidence and physical conditioning through tae kwon do," Shawah says. "It is a great opportunity for men and women because of the confidence, physical conditioning, and especially the self-defense techniques that are developed."

Other members of the club agree, and fully understand the nature of the techniques that they have mastered.

"In reality, we've learned how to hurt people, but more than ninety percent of us never use it. It [learning tae kwon do] is for the self-confidence and the great physical fitness that the system gives," says Megan Carr '94.

"Tae Kwon Do appeals to goal-oriented people," adds Rheam. One would be hard-pressed to disagree, for Rheam has seen 25 black belts graduate from the program, which is the highest level of skill possible in the art for most students.

Tae kwon do, a Korean martial art whose name literally means "way of kicking and punching," differs in many ways from karate, the Japanese martial art.

"Karate does more with the hands and makes a few basics very strong," says Carr, a junior who has had classes in karate prior to coming to Bucknell. "Tae kwon do involves more high kicking. There is a wider variety of forms to use, and eventually a person chooses which is best, based on the individual's stature and personal preferences."

Carr, who is now a brown belt in both karate and tae kwon do, is the official assistant who teaches beginners and helps to lead classes along with Rheam.

Rheam, who graduated from Bucknell eighteen years ago, began learning karate in 1973. While attending graduate school at Wake Forest University, Rheam joined the tae kwon do club there and has stayed with it ever since. The bankruptcy lawyer also owns and instructs at the American Tae Kwon Do Academy, Inc. on Market Street in Lewisburg.

"He's given a lot of time to Bucknell students," says Shawah of his instructor. "One of his strong points is his mastery of self-defense, which provided a valuable new approach to the traditional form of instruction for us."

The demonstration this weekend will highlight Bucknell students, who will show off the skills they have learned so far. The exhibition is expected to include form displays, board-breaking, and a comic skit whose content has been classified "top secret" by members of the club.

The group meets on Bucknell's campus on Monday and Friday evenings from 6 to 8 p.m. in the fieldhouse.

Gibbons: BU's shooting star

BY BILL BROWN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Undoubtedly, Lisa Gibbons '95, Bucknell's all-time leader in scoring for women's soccer, vastly improved the Bison team when she arrived on campus in September of 1991. Named the Patriot League Rookie of the Year for last year's campaign, Gibbons led the Bison in scoring with 15 goals and 2 assists, a total that placed her second among all Patriot League players.

Although the Bison have languished near the bottom of the Patriot League for most of the current season, Gibbons' extraordinary skills and quickness have allowed her to continue to be a confounding menace to opposing coaches. This year, she again leads Bucknell in scoring.

Gibbons hails from Camp Hill, a suburb of Harrisburg that is a 75-minute drive south from campus. Gibbons' father was formally a practicing attorney and currently is the executive director of the Whitaker Foundation. Her mother worked as a writer before she retired to become a homemaker while her daughter attended high school. After Gibbons left for college, she went to graduate school and has started writing again.

Gibbons' has one older brother, Miles, who is also a success story, and graduated from Duke University a few years ago.

The first sport Gibbons loved, ironically enough, was football. She yearned to play on the gridiron but, because they believed that she was too small for the sport, her parents directed her toward soccer instead. Gibbons was only six years old when she competed in soccer for the first time.

Thereafter, she went on to excel at every level of the game. When Gibbons entered Camp Hill High School—which did not field a women's soccer team—she not only made the men's squad, but also was named a starter. During her four years of varsity action, her name appeared on the roster of the league all-star team every season with the exception of her sophomore year. She also played for the Eastern Pennsylvania state team for seven years, and found time to participate in basketball, track, and student government for her high school.

Later, Gibbons made one of four regional teams across the nation both in the under-14 and in the under-16 categories. In 1988, after her regional team faced the other three regional squads in the country in a tournament, she was named to the national team. This All-American honor was bestowed upon only 18 players in the nation.

Ruud Gullit, a soccer player for the AC Milan club in Italy, is Gibbons' favorite player and also her inspiration. The person who has had the most direct influence on her career, however, is George Pulita.

"He [Pulita] used to play for Argentina—not the national team, but he played professional soccer. He was my state team coach and he tutored me," says Gibbons.

The tutoring lessons meant that she had to travel to Philadelphia every other weekend for about a year while in high school.

Gibbons was courted by many universities when she was a senior at Camp Hill, including some of the best women's soccer programs in the country. She gave serious consideration to five universities: Duke, Rutgers, Hartford, New Hampshire, and Bucknell.

"I chose Bucknell because it's a good school and it's small," Gibbons explains. "I didn't want soccer to be my life because I knew it wouldn't be my life after school. I wanted to concentrate more on academics than sports."

Gibbons went on to emphasize that Bucknell's reputation as one of the premier academic institutions in the United States convinced her to attend school in Lewisburg. The fact that Bucknell is deeply committed to its student-athletes' academic status and prospects for future success, furthermore, was a significant factor in her decision to come to the University.

The sophomore recently joined the sorority Alpha Chi Omega, and has chosen psychology as her major. She is especially intrigued by criminal psychology and animal behavior, and would like to have a career that is related to one of these fields.

Despite the fact that Bucknell's women's soccer team (5-11-1) has failed to improve this fall over last year's 7-9 record, Gibbons remains optimistic when questioned about next year.

"Our team is a very young team, and it's only in its second recruiting year," says Gibbons. "I'm assuming next year's team is going to be better than this year's team, and it's all going to depend on the recruits we get."

Apart from their busy schedule for this all-year sport, the team members take time out to help others by visiting nursing homes, teaching summer camps, and hosting, as they did last weekend, midget cheerleading camps.

"They are very hard-working," says Engleman. "These kids put in twelve-hour days."

"People think that it's so easy being out there just cheering," adds Curtiss. "We like to do it, but it's hard to cheer for a school when no one yells back and no one in the stands is showing support for their school. It makes our 'job' harder." So tomorrow and in the future when you're sitting in the bleachers and you here a resounding "GO B.U.!" join in and give something to the people who give this school so much.

"I think that cheerleading is really fun and no matter what, you get more out of it than you put into it. No matter what the time commitment is or how hard it gets sometimes, it's a really good experience," says Cherry.

Clearly, the members of the cheerleading team enjoy what they do.

"It got me involved in Bucknell's campus and it's turned out to provide tremendous friendships," says Larsen. "I can't imagine Bucknell without cheerleading."

WHAT'S THE SCORE?

Only dyed-in-the-wool football fans can truly appreciate the service that Rogers Men's Wear provides them with every Saturday afternoon in the fall. The store's owner, Roger Libby, continues a 68-year tradition each weekend during the college football season by painting the scores of major games going on in the East, South, and Midwest regions of the country, and updating them each quarter. they let the game slip away in the third and fourth periods.

"We were unable to score on our counter-attack opportunities, and because of that we got burnt at the other end of the pool," Zeigler said of the disappointing 10-6 loss. He added that a lack of offense in the final two periods contributed to the defeat: "We couldn't put our shots away."

Victory finally came for Bucknell in the final match against Loyola Marymount, as the Bison came out on the winning end of a 14 to 9 score. Zeigler credited the win to the fact that the squad "finally put together a good game. The offense got going behind the good outside shooting of Chris Retzler ['93], and the continued steady offensive play by Sean Tierney ['95]."

Goalie Rupert DeVink '94 had an exceptional day as he chalked up 14 saves in the victory.

The tournament was eventually won by U-Cal Berkley, the number one-ranked team in the country, as they defeated second-ranked Stanford in overtime.

"It was good to watch the championship game because it showed the team what kind of intensity level that you need in order to win championships," Zeigler later commented. He went on to say that, by the end of the weekend, the Bison did not feel as awed by the bigger and stronger teams such as USC: "We're a young team and for most of them it was their first trip out to California, and it's natural for them to be intimidated."

The men's squad will have to overlook its losses in California starting tomorrow, when it will be at Princeton to play in the Mid Atlantic Conference championships.

"The trip will help us this weekend because we had an intense weekend in California, and we'll be in the right frame of mind," said Zeigler.

The MAC Championship will not only decide the winner of the conference, but it will also be crucial in determining who else will attend the Eastern Championship in Annapolis the following weekend.

The first game that the Bison will have is a rematch against a Navy team that narrowly defeated them in their first meeting here in Lewisburg two weeks ago.

"We'll have to come out at one hundred percent against Navy," said Zeigler, "and I think that a victory against Navy will give us a spot in the Easterns."

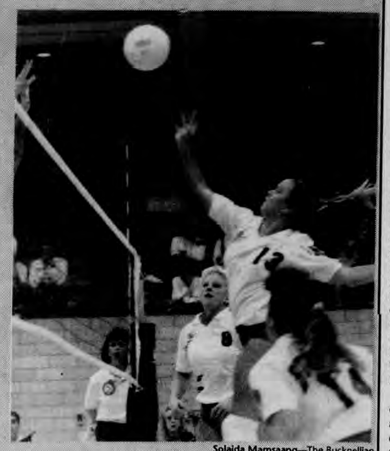
Lady Spikers intensify play vs. Big East foes

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer



Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Co-captain Aubrey Schneggenburger '95 rises above the rest and prepares to unleash her hitting fury upon the ball. Schneggenburger will look to help her team rise above its Patriot League opponents this weekend in Annapolis, MD.

The women's volleyball team was in search of win number four of the 1992 season this past week, yet it would need to beat some big teams to do this—Big East teams, that is.

Unfortunately, the Bison were unsuccessful, and they entered three more notches in the loss column after being defeated by powerhouses Boston College and Connecticut and a less challenging opponent from Iona.

The Lady Spikers (3-19) traveled to the Empire State one week ago to complete a two-day, three-game run that marked the beginning of their toughest stretch of competition to prepare them for the Patriot League Championships.

"I think some good things happened and I think some bad things happened," said head coach Cindy Opalski about the road trip.

On Friday, the Orange and Blue bandits looked to steal a victory from their big bad opponents from Boston College. Filled with enthusiasm and intensity, the ladies of Lewisburg locked in on their opponents. With the first two games of the match tightly secured in the talons of the Golden Eagles, 15-5 and 15-4, Bucknell rose to a level which it had seldom visited all season. Heather Hoehn '94 blasted her way to nine kills and a respectable .364 attack percentage for the match, while Katie Steele '96 kept the ball in play in registering six digs. They fought hard and kept their focus throughout, although the opposing squad eventually picked up the victory, 15-11, and the match, 3-0. Opalski was impressed with the team's level of concentration and focus, yet she wondered whether the team's play would be consistent, or if the roller coaster ride was going to continue.

The next day, the question was answered—yet for the Bison, it was not the answer that they had hoped for.

"We just didn't play," said Opalski. "We just didn't play hard at the intensity we need to be successful."

The scores did not reflect the less-than-respectable effort of the Lady Spikers, as Iona swept the Bison 16-14, 15-4 and 15-10 to give team its 18th defeat of the season. Despite the closeness in the scores, the Blue and Orange offensive punch was non-existent, as the team compiled a 12% attack percentage that was combined with seven service errors and a host of receiving miscues.

One could hear the music from the Twilight Zone in the background as Bucknell prepared to square off against its next opponent, the Huskies of Connecticut. Again, an outstanding effort was turned in by the Lady Spikers, only to see nothing come of it.

The team regained its focus after the disappointing loss to Iona and displayed talent that its record does not indicate, tallying only ten attack errors throughout the match.

"I saw some wonderful things against UConn," said Opalski.

The defense kept itself between the ball and the floor as well, registering four blocks and an impressive number of digs. Amy Miller '95 paced the Lady Spiker defense with ten digs and was followed closely by co-captains Sarah Mesaros '93 and Aubrey Schneggenburger '94 with eight. Quarterbacked by setter Brenda Hayduk '96, Steele and Laura Spinney '95 led the offensive firepower, recording eight- and seven-kill efforts, respectively.

A lack of consistency for the Bison has been their major problem all year long. They have intensified their level of play against strong teams such as St. Bonaventure, Boston College and UConn, for example, while turning in their worst efforts against weaker opponents like Iona, Lafayette and Lock Haven.

"You can't get mad at these people. You can't lose faith in them," said Opalski. "They have so much talent and ability—We're just too young to find the right recipe to put together to bake the cake right now. Right now we would probably be 13-8, if we had played up to this [high] level."

With its three-win record, Bucknell will look forward to an onslaught of Patriot League opponents over Parents Weekend. Today and tomorrow the squad will take on Navy, Army and Holy Cross in Annapolis.

Next week, the Bison will face Vermont and the Lions of Columbia in New York. Then, the following weekend, Bucknell will compete in the Patriot League Championships. The double-elimination tourney allows any team a fair shot at winning the coveted title, and this possibility leaves the Spikers positive since they feel that they can come in as an underdog and upset some teams.

"The key for the team now is to beat Holy Cross and get out of the cellar, so that we will be playing against the second- third- or fourth-ranked team [in the tourney]," said Opalski. "We can be in the finals."

The bumpy ride in 1992 has still not dropped off. Will the Lady Spikers be able to make that steep climb and look out over the rest of the carnival, or will they remain in the loop-de-loop of losses that currently plagues them?

Comeback fails as JV Bison fall to Lafayette, 27-26

BY ROSS FEINGOLD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In what came as a tremendously disappointing loss, the Bison junior varsity football team fell to the Lafayette Leopards 27-26 at Christy Mathewson Stadium this past Sunday. In the end, a combination of missed opportunities on offense and critical defensive mistakes did the squad in.

The Bison (2-2) got off to a good start early as David Todd '95 intercepted a Lafayette pass on the second play from scrimmage. On its third possession of the quarter, quarterback Andy Amrhein '94 led a drive that put Bucknell on the Lafayette 42. After throwing for two first downs on the drive, Amrhein handed the ball off to tailback Pete Gorski '96, who brought the crowd to its feet with a 42-yard run down the sideline for a touchdown. Gorski eluded several Lafayette players before breaking free and giving the Bison the first points of the game.

The only points of the second quarter were posted by the Leopards, who, in a sign of things to come later in the contest, were able to efficiently pass their way downfield to position themselves for a short touchdown run that knotted the game at 7-7.

The ensuing Bucknell drive stalled on the Lafayette 46, and on first down the Lafayette quarterback completed a 27-yard pass and followed this up with a 14-yard completion the next play. Lafayette ran the ball in for 6 points on the next down from scrimmage, but the Bison defense was able to block the extra-point attempt.

Then, in a microcosm of the kind of problems plaguing the troubled Bison football program this season, Lafayette was driving in the final seconds of the half when the timekeeper stopped the clock with one second left. The visiting team was given a freebie final play and, although the defense was able to hold the Leopards, the coaching staff and the fans were visibly upset with the miscue up in the box.

When they came out for the second half facing a 13-7 deficit, it looked as if the Bison were ready to take control of the game. Amrhein led the home team downfield from the opening kickoff in a drive that culminated in the junior running the ball in for a touchdown from the one.

However, it was at this point that things began to fall apart for the Orange and Blue. On its first play after the kickoff Lafayette rushed for 16 yards. Then, on a third and six from the Bucknell 41, the Leopard quarterback, who was chased out of the pocket by the Bison pass rush, found an open receiver who took the pass and ran right by the defense for touchdown.

"We had a couple of breakdowns on defense," said safety Jason Rubin '96. "They sent receivers down the sidelines that we had to cover and one guy was able to get behind the linebackers and in front of the safeties and beat us for the touchdown."

Added linebacker Brien Davis '96, "We couldn't contain the quarterback and we gave him too much time." Davis was tops for the squad with five unassisted tackles for the game, along with Andy Doremus '96.

The Bison accomplished nothing on their next possession and were forced to punt from their own 18. The Orange and Blue coverage team thought that the ball would be spotted at the Bucknell 46 after it came down, but a Bison player inadvertently touched the ball when it came down at the Bison 37—a mistake that would hurt as it put Lafayette in excellent field position.

The visiting team was able to capitalize, as on first down it threw for a 28-yard completion followed up by a rushing touchdown three plays later. The extra point gave Lafayette a 27-14 lead.

Cornerback Charles Crudup '96 later described what happened to Bucknell. "We didn't give up any big rushing plays but a few big pass plays killed us. We missed some assignments and some coverages."

The offense did not seem to be going anywhere in the second half. The Bison suffered from the loss of Gorski, who had to miss most of the second half with a pulled muscle in his back. Gorski rushed for 61 yards on 11 carries, and caught a pass for ten yards, almost exclusively in the first half.

Amrhein (9-19, 118 yards and two interceptions) caught some Elway fever, though, and engineered a Bison comeback in the fourth quarter. From his own 30, he hit John Sakowski '96 for a 30-yard pass completion. After moving the Bison to the Lafayette 16 with the help of a few penalties, Amrhein found Darren Bloch '96 for a touchdown pass that put Bucknell back in the game, 27-20.

However, the extra point attempt was missed by Erik Steiler '96, and a penalty that was tacked on to the following kickoff caused the Bison to kick from the 50. The ball was fumbled by Lafayette and recovered by Bucknell at the opposition's 13, setting the stage for an exciting final few minutes.

A combination of rushing plays and Lafayette penalties (the Leopards were penalized 11 times for 94 yards on the day) gave Bucknell a first and goal from the two. Early celebration was ill-advised, though, as Bucknell tried and failed to get the ball in. In fact, the Bison were stopped three times before Bloch ran the ball in on fourth down for the score.

With a one-point deficit, Bucknell went for the win via a two-point conversion. The attempt failed, and Bucknell was forced to face defeat for the second week in a row.

According to the players, this was a game that should have been a victory. Said Gorski, "Our line did an excellent job, but our offense stalled a couple of times. We had our opportunities and should have won."

Gorski eluded several Lafayette players before breaking free...

Women's tennis second singles player Kristina Lutter '95 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of Oct. 30 for her outstanding play in the Towson State Fall Classic and throughout her 1992 campaign.

At season's end, Lutter finished atop the Patriot League with a 13-0 overall record which included six victories over Patriot League opponents. Her perfect record and stellar play helped propel the women's tennis team to victory at the Patriot League Championships and a 12-1 for the year.

The sophomore hails from Crystal Lake, IL and is pursuing a degree in the liberal arts.

year without the explosive scoring threat of Lisa Gibbons '95? What would football head coach Lou Maranzana have done last season had it not been for the talent of his two young guns at quarterback, Travis Kopp '95 and Rob Glus '95?

The list does not end there. There are many other Bucknell athletes who began their playing careers as freshmen and they have functioned just fine.

I think that the faculty needs to consider that college is a time for students to grow up—to make their own decisions. College is supposedly a microcosm of the real world, so allow students to judge situations for themselves and to make the necessary adjustments for them to sustain themselves and their careers, both academic and athletic.

For many alumni, balancing academics and athletics as a freshman helped them to develop not only as a student or as an athlete but also as a person, and I don't feel that our future athletes should be denied the same opportunity. Keep in mind that most students learn more outside the classroom than inside the classroom. I pose the following question to the faculty: do you want to stand in the way of education?

broke a few tackles, and 36 yards later found himself in the end zone.

The play broke the backs of the Bison, who were poised for a shot at a possible game-tying drive. The defense kept the Bison in the game the entire half, but they simply came up short. In fact, in comparing the first half stats to the third quarter stats, there are some impressive differences. For example, Holy Cross piled up 12 first downs in the first half as compared to only one in the third quarter. The Crusaders racked up 232 total yards in the first half, but only 30 in the third quarter.

"We started tackling better and playing with more intensity," said head coach Lou Maranzana, commenting on the second half. Defensive end John Lusk '93 noted that for the rest of the season to be successful, the defense will have to repeat that performance. "We need to get our heads on straight and play like we did in the second half," said Lusk.

Tomorrow, the Bison will host Fordham (0-7) at Christy Mathewson Stadium. After almost upsetting Lehigh in their opener, it has been all downhill for the Rams. Since joining the Patriot League, Fordham is winless in three contests with Bucknell.

In last year's affair in the Bronx, the Bison won 21-14 for their only win of 1991. Bucknell's defense dominated that game, holding Fordham to minus-29 net rushing yards and registering six quarterback sacks.

This year the Bison must contend with Fordham's passing game. Backup quarterback John Pohlman threw three touchdown passes last week against Lafayette, and All-Patriot League wideout Tom Garlick is the Rams' all-time leading passcatcher.

Maranzana forecasts a hard-fought contest tomorrow. "These are two pretty well-matched teams—both sides are hungry," said the fourth-year head coach.

As for the burning question of who will start at quarterback, Maranzana was unsure of his decision as of his weekly television show which was aired earlier this week. "We'll assess how they played in their last appearance as well as during the week and go from there," he remarked. "It is possible they may both play."

"Midnight Madness"

For all of you who can't wait for basketball season to tip-off, relax. Tomorrow night at midnight, the NCAA will lift its ban on organized practices and allow the coaches to join their players in the first practice of the season.

The Breakin' Bison will have an intersquad scrimmage from midnight until one in the morning, complete with a lay-up/dunk pre-game warm-up.

The scoreboard, public address and music system will complete the atmosphere in the semi-renovated gym. Come on out to see the opening of the 1992-93 season!

X-country looks to seize titles in NY

Men's

Bucknellian Staff Writer

"It's like someone is trying to break into your home and steal something that's been yours forever," stated cross country head coach Art Gulden, when asked to describe tomorrow's Patriot League Championships in New York's Van Cortlandt Park.

For the past 17 years (15 in the East Coast Conference & two in the Patriot League), the men's cross country champion has been a foregone conclusion: Bucknell in a landslide. This year an arrogant Lehigh team (can you really afford to be pompous when your colors are brown and white?) has stated over and over again that "the Bucknell dynasty is over and the Lehigh one starts this year."

Gulden will send his top nine runners, including tri-captains Tom Eagleson '93, Judd Jarden '93, and John Lewis '93. However, it's the other six who hold the keys to victory: Jim Farrer '93, Michael Bronson '93, Eitan Tabak '94, Jim DeFinnis '95, Steve Clarke '95, and Chris Priestaf '95 will need to fend off the boys from Bethlehem, at least until the first five Bison cross the finish line.

"How we react to having someone from our own conference running with us will determine the entire race," said Gulden. "We're physically ready for any challenge."

Just because Lehigh and Bucknell are the two favored teams, don't be surprised to see some individuals from other schools make their marks. Colgate's top runner, Ray Appenheimer, and Lafayette's top runner, Nuno Santo, are expected to abandon the team concept in favor of individual honors right from the starting pistol.

While this year's team doesn't have the apparent talent of last year's national-caliber squad, it did post a perfect 6-0 mark. Four of those six victories were clean sweeps and the Bison took top-ten honors out at the highly competitive Indiana Invitational as well.

"We're perfectly healthy and on schedule," commented Gulden. "The team looked great and was aggressive in workouts all week. They've all put in the time, sweat, and miles—It's just a matter of putting it together Saturday."

At high noon tomorrow, the war of the words that the boys from Steeltown have been waging for almost a year will finally be settled.

Read my lips: Bucknell will win its 18th straight conference championship.

Women's

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Throughout the fall, the women's cross country team has been striving to assert itself and create its own identity. Tomorrow morning at the third annual Patriot League Championships in New York's Van Cortlandt Park, however, the Bison will line up as one of four legitimate favorites for the title.

Captain Kristin Opdyke '93 has been dominant in dual meets, leading the team to a 3-2 record. She will compete with prohibited favorite Lauren Gubicza, last year's champ from Fordham, for top individual honors.

Depth, and not just one top runner, will determine this year's champion. Joining Opdyke in the top nine will be all underclassmen. Kathy Wurster '94, Jessica Wilhelm '95, Becky Tobin '95, Leah Johnson '95, and Megan Idell '95 make up the non-freshman portion of this young team. Nicole Kropp '96, Maria Ryan '96, and Bridgette Mayer '96 round out the youthful Bison who will be competing tomorrow.

Battling Bucknell for top honors will be Fordham, Holy Cross and Lehigh. The Lady Rams are the defending champions, but face the strong possibility of relinquishing their trophy.

"All four of the favorites could all finish within ten points of each other," said head coach Art Gulden. "Everybody's healthy and on schedule for tomorrow."

When asked what the key to the race might be, Gulden didn't hesitate to say, "Whichever school comes ready to compete that morning will be the winner. We're not physically dominated by anyone—we just have to be mentally strong."

The team left earlier today for "The City" in preparation for what could be its first Patriot League cross country title. Nobody in Bucknell's athletic department will go on record as saying that we need these points if we want to defend our Patriot League Presidents' Cup trophy, but they could be crucial.

compromise) for this problem is clear: try to schedule as many away games as possible on weekends and/or at night, when normal class hours here in Lewisburg are not in session.

The main question that we must ask ourselves, then, is this: Does it behoove the University more to field sports teams on the road in the current fashion, or to better acclimate our first-year students to Bucknell life?

Allow me to give out a hint—one of these options merely makes the University's sports programs somewhat stronger for four years by bringing freshmen players to foreign soil; the other makes better students and, as a result, adults that are better-equipped to guide our country's future. Let's think about this, and stop concerning ourselves with short-term desires so that we can realize the long-term good—that of proper learning.

There are too many complaints today that collegiate athletics are deteriorating into a "business," and, concurrently, that America's educational system is in severe decline. Let's get Bucknell's freshmen out from behind the eight ball of missing classes, and help to kill two birds with one stone.

Crew teams row in the Head of the Charles

BY JACQUELYN SHRIVER

For only the second time in the history of Bucknell crew, the team entered two boats in the 1992 Head of the Charles Regatta. With nearly a quarter of a million spectators lining the waters between Boston and Cambridge, the varsity women and the varsity lightweight men competed against some of the most competitive crews in the world. Indeed, over one thousand boats from eight countries maneuvered their way along the rough, winding Charles River last Saturday.

The varsity women were especially impressive, placing twenty-fourth out of thirty-five formidable crews with an unofficial time of 19:16:57. From bow to stern, the team consisted of Jen Elder '95, Robin Black '95, Tiffany Flexer '94, Megan Buehler '94, Mieke Zylstra '94, Gwen Lewis '93, Tina Pinto '94, stroke Jen Criss '94, and coxswain Erin Burns '93.

The women defeated worthy competition from Smith College, Harvard Law School, and the Boston Rowing Club, a prestigious Olympic training camp. Burns was happy with how her crewmates performed, remarking afterward that they "all worked hard and did an outstanding job. I really don't think we could have rowed any better."

Similarly, many of the women felt that they had all performed to the best of their ability.

The varsity lightweight men were comprised of bowman Andy Bush '93, Brad Carlson '95, Jim Behnke '93, Brent Chandaria '93, Edward Williams '93, Drew Wall '95, Marc Ortland '95, Norm Bartlett '93, and coxswain Jacquelyn Shriver '93. They placed a somewhat disappointing thirty-first out of thirty-eight. Yet, despite this placing, the lightweights' time of 16:22:23 bested a tough crew from the Florida Institute of Technology (FIT), who is traditionally quite strong in this event, and also defeated Boston College for the second consecutive week. Chandaria, along with many of the other men, attributed their placing to the time-trial format of the race itself. In a head race, the crews are timed individually and then ranked.

"An opposing boat to push us on forces us to work harder and subsequently to place higher," said Chandaria. He commented that "we know we can do better, given the right kind of competition."

Following the challenging and intense competition at the Head of the Charles, the Bison will head south tomorrow during Parents Weekend. The entire squad—including the newly-formed men's and women's novice boats—will compete in the Head of the Occoquan regatta in Fairfax Co., Va. Here Bucknell crew has traditionally been successful, facing competition more reasonable than that found in Boston two weeks ago.

To travel or not to travel —that is the question

How would you feel if you were heavily recruited by a school to play a sport, yet when you attended that school and your athletic season began, you were not allowed to play in away games? This is what Bucknell's faculty is proposing to do to our freshmen athletes. They have formed a committee to write a regulation that would prohibit first-semester freshmen from traveling to away games when it may cause them to miss class. Now I ask you, how fair would that be? Bucknell, along with the Patriot League, which is the league in which most Bison sports teams compete, are always boasting about how it maintains the balance that a student-athlete needs to succeed inside and outside the classroom. To support this regulation would be to directly contradict that which Bucknell's students, faculty, and administration take pride in.

The Patriot League's award, the President's Cup, recognizing the school with the best student-athletes, has been won by Bucknell each of the last two years. I don't understand why this is arising as a problem for the faculty. Bucknell has exemplified what a scholar-athlete should be by having the highest graduation rate among athletes and the second highest number of Academic-All Americans over the last ten years.

This prohibition of sorts in my eyes would accomplish very little since students have to adjust eventually. I personally believe that the earlier a student makes the necessary adjustments, the more it will benefit him or her. With this regulation in effect, the same students will have to overcome the obstacle of missing classes for athletic events at the beginning of their sophomore year. That's strange—the faculty is always telling its students not to procrastinate, yet it wants to create a written statement that does just that. Irony—you know I love it.

This anti-traveling restriction would be unfair to fall athletes purely for the reason that theirs will be the only sports that would be affected. The faculty feels that first-semester freshmen need that time to adjust to college life and the rigors of the new academia. By imposing this rule, school spirit would be lessened because teams may not play up to their potential since coaches would be prevented from fielding their best teams. Hey, let's face it, nobody likes a loser. Close your eyes with me now and try to imagine some of our sports teams without the contributions of their freshmen. Would our women's tennis team have been adorned with the Patriot League crown without the contributions of its sensational freshmen trio of Lauren Weihl, Sara Allen and Erika Anhood? Would the women's soccer team have made the playoffs in only its second varsity season last

CON

There is currently a movement afoot in Bucknell's faculty to make it against University policy to pull first-semester freshman athletes from classes to leave campus for away sporting events. To many students, this cause may come across as merely being a case of Bucknell's professors trying to set the campus agenda to their own liking. However, upon closer analysis, intelligent observers will see that this proposed plan would benefit our first-year Bucknellians greatly, and should be backed by faculty and students alike.

This proposal, first of all, would only be limited to the first four months of a student's athletic career, and would only be put in place because freshmen have enough to worry about from September to December without being pulled away from a handful of classes in their first collegiate semester ever.

Upperclass athletes at Bucknell have years of experience under their belts, and have learned over the semesters how to budget their time between academics and sports. Conversely, freshmen are just getting adjusted to an entirely new—and often bewildering—world, and hardly know which end is up as far as what is expected of them in the University's academic program. This reason, above all others, is why they so desperately need this time in the classroom to acclimate themselves.

The problem of overloading the freshman class with too many obligations in its first semester, additionally, has been addressed in other areas of campus life. Bucknell's fraternities and sororities have been forced to change to sophomore rush in order that first-year students can settle into University life, so why shouldn't this movement be included in our athletic department's operations? What we basically have here is a situation where the latter group has significantly more lobbying weight than the former, and this double standard should not be tolerated any longer.

While road trips pulling freshmen out of classes do not occur frequently in the general scheme of things, lectures missed during the semester do eventually add up.

A missed bit of information from just one class may mean one more question answered incorrectly on an exam, exams translate into a major portion of a student's grades, and grades affect one's chances for landing a job after graduation. These long-term connections are currently not being made by the administration and athletic department.

A change in this policy does not even necessarily mean, furthermore, that freshmen would have to be wholly ineligible for away games. While it will admittedly pose a sticky challenge to the athletic department, a solution (and

Women's tennis ends with Towson blitz

All of the Bison's singles and doubles seeds reach the finals round, seven of them win

BY DAN TARDITI
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The women's tennis team capped off an amazing season this past weekend with a dominating performance at the Towson State Fall Classic. The team's catchword for the tournament was "desire," and the Bison certainly showed their hunger as they ripped through the opposition for the final time this year.

In number one singles semi-final action, Julia Diaz '95 defeated Pam Henderson of Washington College, 6-1, 4-6, 7-5. Diaz was slightly erratic in the first set, but soon righted herself for the win.

"I was down 5-4 in the second set, and sort of took it for granted and lost. In the third set I was down 4-1 and I just didn't want to lose," explained Diaz.

In number-one singles championship play, Diaz won 6-0, 6-3 over highly-touted April Jourdan of Towson State. The sophomore had played Jourdan in doubles action the previous day, a factor that Diaz said was a key to her win: "I had played her the day before in doubles, so I kind of knew how she played. I knew she had a powerful two-handed forehand, but her backhand was weak. So I played her backhand and won."

In number two singles, Kristina Lutter '95 finished off her impressive season with a win in semi-finals play, 6-0, 6-2, over Candy Clark of Hofstra. She had a little more trouble with her championship match, but went on to rally from one set down to seize the victory, 4-6, 6-4, 6-1, against Towson State's Laurie Morgan.

Team captain Kymm Carlson '94 won her number three singles semi-final match against Hofstra's Rebecca Wales, 6-0, 6-1. Carlson, however, lost the championship match to Towson State's Terry Matthews, 6-1, 5-7, 0-6.

"The finals were the main thing for me. I lost two match points and lost," said Carlson. "She changed her game and I just couldn't make the adjustment."

Lauren Weihl '96 won an extended number four singles semi-final match, 7-5, 7-6 (7-2), over Jen Frank of Towson State. Tina Lennon of Washington College also fell at the hands of Weihl, 6-2, 6-0, to cap off an impressive season for the freshman.

In number five singles, Sara Allen '96 defeated Jennifer Kressman of Towson State, 4-6, 6-0, 6-1. This was a strange twist of fate for Allen, since both she and Kressman hailed from the same area.

"I had played her before, but I had never beaten her," said Allen. "In the first set, she wiped me up in the first four games, but I learned how to play her game." Allen didn't need to make any adjustments in the championship match as she dominated, 6-2, 6-0, over Heather Calvano of Hofstra.

Freshman Erika Anhood received a bye in her semi-final match, but got no such luxury in the championship as she took a tough game against Kerry O'Sullivan of Towson State, 7-5, 6-2.

Bucknell's doubles teams played some of their best tennis of 1992, as all three duos made it to the championship matches of their respective brackets. The impressive pair of Diaz and Carlson in number one doubles was too much for the competition as it won, 6-2, 6-3, over Towson State in the semi-final matchup.

In the championship they were overpowering again, 6-3, 6-3, against an overmatched Hofstra team. As Diaz said, "Kymm and I haven't played like that since the Patriot League championships last year. We both made shots we couldn't believe."

The number two doubles team of Weihl and Allen won its first semi-final match easily, 6-2, 6-2, over Washington College. Allen, for her part, thought that the first match was a little easier to play than the championship: "The doubles semi-final match seemed like the regular season. In the final, the two girls we played were both from around my area, and I knew they were both really good high school players—but I didn't let Lauren know."

Despite losing the first set, they went on to dominate the final two sets and win, 4-6, 6-1, 6-2.

"We weren't motivated in the first set, and after losing the first set, Lauren and I really concentrated," said Allen, who felt that desire played a large role in the victory. "We wanted to make this one of our best matches, since it was the last of the season."

Number three doubles partners Lutter and Christine McMillan '95 dominated their semi-final match, 6-0, 6-2, over Hofstra, but the tandem later came up short against Towson State, losing, 7-5, 6-3.

Holy Cross teaches Bucknell 27-12 lesson

Bison lose QB Travis Kopp '95 for the season; frosh Peter Harteveld to start vs. Rams

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Bucknell Bison lost more than just a football game last Saturday—it lost its most promising young player as well. Starting quarterback Travis Kopp '95 will miss the remainder of the season after breaking an ankle early in the first half of Bucknell's 27-12 loss at Holy Cross.

Rob Glus '95 replaced Kopp and completed 11 of 17 passes for 71 yards, but he was removed after he threw his second interception of the afternoon.

Freshman Peter Harteveld was more successful in leading the offense than Glus. Taking over midway into the third quarter, Harteveld completed 11 of 22 passes for 176 yards and one touchdown—a 21-yard pass to Whitey Berardinelli '93. Another long drive went for naught when Harteveld was intercepted at the goal line.

Fullback Scott Wikander put Holy Cross on the board first with a one-yard touchdown plunge, which was the first of two Wikander scores on the day. The next possession for Bucknell (3-4) was the one that will haunt the team for the rest of the season. On third down and ten, Kopp dropped back to pass. Feeling his pocket collapse, he decided to scramble up the middle, where he was met by 245-pound defensive tackle Jim Bowes.

Tragically, Kopp's leg was contorted in a Joe Theismann-like fashion, thus ending the season of the nation's thirteenth-ranked Division I-AA quarterback in terms of efficiency rankings.

One play after the injury, Glus tossed an interception, giving Holy Cross (3-4) the ball in Bucknell territory. Its drive resulted in a field goal, and later in the first half tailback Eric Sampson scampered three yards for a touchdown to give the Crusaders a 17-0 lead.

Bucknell avoided a truly disastrous first half when, with four minutes remaining, Kevin McElvene '93 scored from one yard out. The Bison killed their own momentum in their traditional way, however, when Justin Frick '94 failed to convert the extra point.

Holy Cross backup quarterback Dave Harrington then engineered a masterful eight-play, 70-yard drive which resulted in a field goal with only 1:33 left in the half. With the Bison playing lethargically after the injury to Kopp, the 20-6 halftime deficit seemed too much to overcome.

Harteveld had other ideas, however, when he took over in the third quarter. After three defensive stands, he began his first drive as a collegiate quarterback from his own 13-yard line. Some powerful running by Matt Walsh '93 and some short passes set the stage for the key play of the drive—a 48-yard crossing pass to Berardinelli. After another first down gave the Bison a first and goal, Harteveld badly overthrew Damon Garner '95, and Todd Araujo picked it off for Holy Cross.

With 93 all-purpose yards on Saturday, Walsh surpassed the 2,500-yard plateau for his career. The senior now has 2,566 total yards, placing him fourteenth in Patriot League history. Walsh is still well behind Bucknell's all-time leader, though, as Dan Scocca amassed 4,404 yards from 1987-90.

After a punt, Bucknell was in great shape, taking over at the Crusader 29-yard line. The drive ended in failure, however, when Frick missed wide to the left from only 28 yards out.

Harteveld stuck by the "if at first you don't succeed..." theory on the next drive. He completed five of six passes, the last to Berardinelli in the end zone, during the nine-play, 78-yard stretch. After coming up empty on the two-point conversion, the Bison trailed 20-12.

Unfortunately for the Bison, the defense—which had come up huge time after time in the second half—suffered one lapse, and it was enough to put the game away for the Crusaders. With just over three minutes remaining in the game, Wikander carried up the middle,

Campus reacts to Clinton victory

Clinton gains 50% of 18-29 age group vote, 43% of overall popular vote

Arkansas Governor Bill Clinton was successful in his campaign for the presidency on Tuesday, gaining a large majority of the electoral college votes over President George Bush and Independent candidate Ross Perot. Clinton secured his victory with 43% of the popular vote, and was able to win 370 of the 538 electoral college votes.

Exit polls indicated that many voters were concerned with the ability to promote change and the current economic conditions, and chose Clinton as the candidate most likely to effect change and aid the economy.

Solaida Mamsaang— The Bucknellian

Zeina Nassis '96 exercises her right to vote by submitting her ballot for the 1992 election Tuesday at the Weis Center. According to Judith Kunkel who worked at the polling center the student turnout was "excellent" this year.

Charles Longley, chair and professor of political science, said that people's perceptions of the economy and Bush's handling of the issue was a major factor in the election. He stated that the weak economy contributed to the outcome in that "conditions were such that Clinton could talk about change" and win support.

In her lecture on Wednesday analyzing the election results, former National President of the League of Women Voters Nancy Neuman stated that Clinton did not waver from the issue of the economy in his campaign, whereas "Bush was always changing his message" and did not discuss his plans for the economy sufficiently.

Neuman stated, "Bush showed that he had no central core of ideas and beliefs" and the issues he tried to make central to the campaign were not the ones that interested most voters. Exit polls seem to bear out her claim, as only 14% of voters surveyed cited family values as the primary issue, 13% cited Clinton's potential for adopting traditionally Democratic "tax-and-spend" policies as a foremost concern, and a mere 8% were interested mainly in foreign policy.

Bush's repeated criticisms of Clinton as a "waffler" who tried to be on all sides of every issue also seemed to be unsuccessful. Neuman claimed that Bush also is a waffler, as he broke his pledge on no new taxes and then apologized, and he was unclear about his role in the Iran-Contra affair.

As for the much discussed character issue, Longley stated, "it's tough to ask the public to hold a referendum on your opponent's character when your own character may be flawed." Exit polls revealed that while voters were not satisfied with Clinton's explanation of the draft, they were uneasy about Bush's involvement in Iran-Contra dealings as well.

Neuman cited the right-wing extremism displayed at this summer's Republican Convention as another factor that harmed Bush's bid for re-election, saying, "the Re-

Faculty passes revised calendaring proposal

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The faculty sent the Committee on Instruction "back to the drawing board" on Monday after adopting an amendment that will push the starting date for the spring semester back from no earlier than Jan. 15 to no earlier than Jan. 20. The proposal, made by John Peeler, professor of political science, outlined specific guidelines that would accommodate both the concerns of the athletic department and of religious students on campus.

Traci Mellinger—the Bucknellian

John Peeler, professor of political science, proposed a calendar sensitive to both athletic and religious groups.

The faculty originally accepted an amendment proposed by Art Gulden, track and cross country coach, that would push the starting date for final exams back after the first weekend in May.

Gulden asked that final exams be scheduled to begin after the first week-end in May since Patriot League Championships, which are the culmination of the outdoor track season, are traditionally held on that date.

Track and field would not be the only team affected by the calendar, Gulden said. The softball team's championships are also scheduled that week-end. In addition, baseball, men's and women's lacrosse and men's and women's crew all conclude their seasons on this date.

Gulden pointed out that a conflict of academic and athletic interests would practically eliminate Bucknell athletes from championship meet participation. He also said a team that does not participate in a meet that traditionally offers some of the best competition of the year will throw away months of training as well as seriously hinder recruiting activities.

If the calendar previously proposed by the Committee on Instruction would have been adopted, that first Saturday in May would fall in the middle of final examinations in nine of the next eleven years.

University policy does not allow students to participate in athletic competition during finals week.

The faculty strongly accepted Gulden's amendment. Athletic Director Rick Hartzell said the faculty meeting was a success because "everyone there was expressing a genuine concern for students, and that's what it ought to be about."

Josh Klatt— The Bucknellian

Art Gulden, track and cross country coach brought to light the effect of the calendar on athletic teams.

Final examinations last at least six days, however, and the flaw in Gulden's proposal was that it did not account for a final schedule that extended from Monday through Saturday.

Many members of the administration have expressed the importance of keeping Friday nights, Saturdays and Sundays open to honor religious practices.

Peeler amended Gulden's proposal to accommodate students' athletic schedules as well as their religious practices. He suggested that the starting date for the semester would be no earlier than January 20, extending classes past the first week-end in May. As a result, finals would begin in the middle of the second week and extend into the third.

Vice President for Academic Affairs Larry Shinn then recommended that Peeler's proposal include a three to five day extension period to give the Committee on Instruction more flexibility to accommodate the needs of both students and faculty.

Peeler's proposal was adopted, thereby replacing Gulden's proposal. The new proposal would allow sufficient time in January for faculty to prepare for the spring semester, as well as adequate time at the end of the semester to correct final exams before grades are due.

The Committee on Instruction met on Wednesday to incorporate Peeler's proposal into their calendaring plan. According to Ben Marsh, chair of the Committee on Instruction, the revised calendar will be presented to the Board of Trustees the week-end of November 13.

In addition to allowing the student athletes to participate in their championships the new calendar also extends the January break. Although this January session will not be as long as the former break "it appears that there will be enough time to do something useful," said Marsh. He added that there is a possibility that some type of January program will be implemented, however there are "many questions" that must be considered.

Shakespeare 'Blooms' in the University Theatre

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Distinguished Shakespearean actress Claire Bloom roars through campus this weekend in a dynamic one-woman show. Tonight at 8 p.m. Bloom will present her solo performance of Then Let Men Know: A Portrait of Shakespeare's Women to be followed tomorow by an acting workshop at 10 a.m.

Tickets for the performance are $5, available from the Langone Center Box Office or at the door. Entrance to the workshop is free and open to the public. Both events will take place in the University Theatre in Coleman.

Born in London, Bloom made her first stage appearance at the age of 16. A year later Bloom received her first major role when she played Ophelia at Stratford-upon-Avon opposite Paul Scofield.

Bloom's later role in Ring Round the Moon, also starring Paul Scofield, led to her role as Teresa in Charles Chaplin's 1952 film Limelight.

Bloom's first trip to America was during a wartime evacuation when she was 11.

Living a year in Florida, she hated it, and did not return for another seven years.

It was only after she had established herself as an actress with the Royal Shakespeare Company and after Chaplin offered her the role of Teresa in Limelight that Bloom ventured back to America.

"My mother came along to chaperone me in Hollywood. Things were different then," said Bloom.

Since then Bloom has crossed the Atlantic frequently, performing in both England and the United States. Film titles to her credit include Richard III, A Doll's House, Crimes and Misdemeanors, and The Spy who Came in from the Cold.

Actress Claire Bloom will present a one-woman performance entitled, "Then Let Men Know: A Portrait of Shakespeare's Women."

Her roles on the London stage have included Juliet, Ophelia, Viola, Miranda, and Cordelia at the Old Vic; in London's West End she has appeared as Sasha in Ivanov, Nora in A Doll's House, Rebecca West in Rosmersholm, and Mme. Ranyeskvya in The Cherry Orchard.

In addition, her 1974 performance of Blanche deBois in a London performance of A Streetcar Named Desire won her three major English theatrical awards.

Her later television performance in Shadowlands granted her Britian's BAFTA Award for the best television actress of the year.

In New York, Bloom has been seen in leading roles in A Doll's House, Hedda Gabler, Rashomon, Vivat! Vivat! Regina! and the stage version of Henry James' The Turn of the Screw.

But what Americans will probably most remember Bloom for is her performance as Lady Marchmain opposite Laurence Olivier in the PBS series Brideshead Revisited. Since then Bloom has been in high demand for television work.

Tuition increase considered

BY WAYNE FERBERT
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The faculty committee recommendation to increase tuition has already been decided and will be sent to the Trustees for review. During the Trustee weekend of November 13 through November 15, the Trustee Finance Committee will vote on the proposed tuition hike.

The faculty proposal is between 7.2% and 7.4%, which represents an overall increase of $1500 dollars to the cost of tuition, room, and board.

The current price tag on a Bucknell education is $16,560 for tuition, $110 for student activity fee, $2,170 for room, and $1,940 for board (7 day/ 3 meal plan), totaling $20,780 for one year.

The cost of higher education has steadily increased over the years and Bucknell's cost structure falls into line with its frame of reference schools. However, the fees for housing are more than 20% lower than many of Bucknell's comparison schools.

It is likely, said Richard Skelton, director of enrollment planning, "that a $1,500 increase would result in a disproportionately larger increase in the cost of housing than in the cost of tuition."

"Assessing the impact of an increase on a typical student can not be done until the Trustees decide what amount of money in the budget to allocate to financial aid," said Skelton.

According to Skelton, the amount of money allocated for financial aid will affect the number of students that will receive aid versus the number of admit-deny cases.

A student's aid is computed as the amount of money a federal formula said a student's family can afford to contribute minus the cost of attending the institution. Therefore, if a student's family contribution does not change and the cost of the institution rises, his or her aid will rise accordingly.

A tuition increase of $1,500 is not yet a foregone conclusion. Two years ago the trustees rejected the faculty committee proposal and approved an increase lower than the faculty recommendation.

The trustees have the power to approve a lower increase or even a higher increase.

"Faculty" examines voting privileges

Faculty considers possibility of extending voting rights to professional staff

BY DENISE MAUTONE AND JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Faculty members have recently begun discussing the possibility of modifying the current system of voting privileges regarding"faculty" decisions.

Although the system has been in place since the 1970s, many professors feel the restrictive nature of the voting rights does not allow for a total representation of the administrative body.

According to English professor Jack Wheatcroft, the issue of who should be eligible to vote is a complicated one.

"As you keep extending voting rights to more and more professionals, the group continues to grow larger. However, you don't want to be so large as to be cumbersome, and therefore inefficient," he said.

The individuals that would be affected by a change in the voting structure would include University professionals involved in computer services, the writing center, and the Athletic Department.

The purpose of the faculty meetings is to vote on various academic issues, Wheatcroft said. Issues voted on in the past have included the abolition of the Jan Plan, the revision of the academic calendar, the apportioning of new staff, planning and budgeting, and the awarding of faculty leaves and sabbaticals.

Recently, however, concerns were being voiced with regards to the present enfranchisement of votes. Consequently, the University Council appointed an Ad Hoc Committee on Faculty Enfranchisement in April of 1989, and members of this committee were asked to decide who they felt should be eligible to vote and serve on voting committees.

In addition, a caucus was organized for people to discuss their grievances and dissatisfactions with the system.

If the history of the voting committee is reviewed, it would show that up until the 1970s only faculty were given the right to vote. It was at this time that professionals such as librarians were allowed to vote.

"The status of librarians in academic institutions varies dramatically across the country," said Nancy Weyant, one of two librarians serving on the Ad Hoc Committee.

Librarians are subject to the same privileges and responsibilities as faculty, and can apply for tenure, although they must also publish their own work periodically in order to remain credible, she added.

"As librarians, we were a unique group," Weyant explained. Librarians help to provide the academic support services needed due to their ability to teach one-on-one, as well as their involvement in the classroom, she said.

One of the primary reasons such professionals were never involved in voting was due to their relative newness on campus, Weyant said.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

Nancy Wyant, reference librarian, said that librarians are an intricate part of the academic program at Bucknell and stressed that they provide support services and one-on-one student interaction.

"When librarians were given the voting privileges, there was no writing center, and computers were just beginning to crop up," she explained.

Today, however, Weyant believes that the writing center and computer services are integral components of academics at Bucknell.

At this point, according to Wheatcroft, the University could look at two possibilities to change the present apportioning of votes. The first option would be to include both professionals and non-professionals alike (janitors, cafeteria workers, maintenance, etc.) into one large voting committee. This motion was made at the first meeting of the ad hoc committee in October, Wheatcroft said.

Weyant and Wheatcroft shared similar concerns regarding this alternative. There are specific instances where the issues at hand only pertain to the curriculum, and in these cases, individuals in the academic sector would be more likely to voice his/her opinions.

"This most definitely does not imply that a student's academic life is not enhanced, if not greatly improved by the instruction of coaches and other athletic directors," Weyant said.

The second option would be to reduce the faculty to one committee, and all other professionals and non-professionals to another committee. The faculty would then be given the discretion to deal solely with matters related to academics.

From Weyant's standpoint, another alternative would be to change nothing at all. "But," she said, "there are so many new people on the scene that many are left out in limbo. These individuals have no forum in which to express their opinions."

For the time being, the present system will stay in effect, and it is not clear whether changes will be made or not.

"Right now, there is a large number of people that play significant roles in Bucknell's educational program," Weyant concluded. "These people are not part of any unit that allow them to have any input in any structured form".

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Thursday, October 29

Officers responded to the entrance of the BU golf course for a reported vehicle accident. An individual stated that he was driving east on Smoketown Road when he lost control of his vehicle and skidded into several trees near the golf course entrance. East Buffalo Police Department investigated. There were no injuries.

Public Safety was contacted by East Buffalo Police Department and requested to assist in attempting to locate a missing student. Student was last seen Wednesday, October 28, by his roommates. East Buffalo Police Department has sent a scope message north and south along the east coast, to all police agencies in an attempt to locate. No further information at this time.

Friday, October 30

Custodial employee in the Langone Center reported the theft of a 4 foot in diameter balloon, from in front of the building, at 1:25 p.m. this date.

Saturday, October 31

At 1:05 a.m., officers were made aware of an injured student at TKE fraternity. The student had sustained a laceration to his right eye when he was accidentally struck by another student while running across the lawn. Injured party was transported to Evangelical ER by Student Health Service driver for treatment.

Officers responded at 1:36 a.m., to Swartz Hall for a reported injured student. On arrival officers found that an individual had sustained a laceration to the palm of his hand. When he was attempting to open his room window his hand slipped and went through a pane of glass.

At 1:00 a.m., officers responded to TKE fraternity for a fire alarm activation. On arrival one of the brothers did attempt to impede the officers entrance to the house. After the officer gained access and determined the cause of the alarm, the alarm was reset. Charges pending against the student who was also verbally abusive to the officers in their attempt to perform their duties.

At 12:30 a.m., officers observed a vehicle driving at a high rate of speed, and in a reckless manner west on Fraternity Road. Officers pursued the vehicle stopping it on River Road, near the BU powerhouse. East Buffalo Township Police were also on the scene. Driver of vehicle was cited for reckless driving, and a passenger in the vehicle was cited for reckless driving, and a passenger in the vehicle was cited for underage consumption of alcohol.

At 10:24 p.m., president of Chi Phi fraternity contacted Public Safety and reported they were detaining two males that had just broken a composite of theirs. Officers responded and found that the two individuals responsible were from another fraternity. Both house presidents decided to handle the matter between the two houses. The individuals responsible for the damage were removed from Chi Phi.

Sunday, November 1

Public Safety was contacted by a local pizza delivery man who stated he had sustained damage to his vehicle while parked in front of Vedder Hall. He stated that as he exited his car a group of unidentified males threw rocks at his vehicle causing a number of dents and chipped paint. The males were seen at a third floor lounge window. To be further investigated.

At 2:50 a.m., East Buffalo Police Department reported that they had recovered a BU sign near Vedder Hall. Officers responded and found that unknown person(s) did remove the Personnel/Career Development sign from in front of the Botany Building. East Buffalo Police Department confiscated the sign, but the individuals responsible fled the scene.

At 2:55 a.m., Student Security advised Public Safety Officers that the Seven Generations sculpture had been damaged. Officers responded and found that the Seventh generation had been dislodged from its foundation. Officers replaced the sculpture to its prior position and a work order was filed for repairs.

Officers were dispatched at 4:47 a.m. for a reported fire alarm malfunction at the first floor of Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity. An unknown person(s) did rip a detector from the ceiling, causing the ceiling panel to break in half and the bracket holding the detector in place to be damaged. Brothers in the immediate area would not provide any information as to who might be responsible. A work order was filed for repairs.

Monday, November 2

A professor in Coleman Hall reported that a VCR had been stolen sometime in June and could not be found. No further information is available at this time.

Wednesday, November 4

Officers responded at 12:28 a.m. for a reported fire alarm activation to Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity. An unknown person(s) did activate a pull station on the first floor for no apparent reason. The pull station and the alarm system were reset.

Iroquois Chief Oren Lyons urges Bucknellians to care for the earth

BY SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the Allegany River Dancers hip-hopped around the stage performing native dances and Iroquois Indian Chief Oren Lyons invitation of induction into the National Lacrosse Hall of Fame was announced last night, differences between Native Americans and a Weis Center full of more recent settlers diminished.

The program opened with the dancers performing a series of celebration dances. The rhythm and instruments that the audience tapped along to were not unfamiliar.

Billy Crouse, leader of the group, admitted that even the Indians had adapted to technology, however. Their shaker instruments are now filled with beebees instead of berries.

Between dances, Crouse also explained the meaning behind his group's native dress. Men wear a single eagle feather in their hair. The position of this feather signifies their tribe.

Women, contrary to what Hollywood would like the country to believe, cover themselves in knee-length skirts, long sleeved blouses, and other unrevealing clothes.

While the dancers showcased some of the Iroquois cultural talents, Chief Lyons explained some of the tribe's philosophies, placing an urgent call for the care of the Earth.

He said, "You'll never have peace as long as you make war against Mother Earth."

According to John Grim, associate professor of religion, President Sojka drove back from a trustee meeting in New York City to present Chief Lyons with a Bison Award for his work with the international environment and diplomacy. This held special meaning to the chief, as buffalo still exist on his Iroquois reservation in upstate New York.

Chief Lyons also stressed the need for the acceptance of diversity in modern society and said that different people have different purposes.

He said that we cannot afford the luxury of racism anymore and that we must look for each person's unique qualities and to how they play a part in the world community.

Programs such as the one last night serve as a way for students and faculty to take an interest in another culture, compare similarities and then appreciate and respect the differences.

Lyons was brought to campus through the efforts of Grim; Alem Asres, director of Multicultural Affairs; and men's lacrosse coach Sid Jamieson. The Indian chief played lacrosse, a sport which originated with the Iroquois Indians, while a student at Syracuse University.

Seven Generations re-dedicated

BY JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Seven Generations sculpture has has been through more ordeals, been the center of more controversy, and the object of more attention and adulation in one year than president-elect Bill Clinton experienced throughout his entire campaign.

And like Clinton, the sculpture is here to stay.

The sculpture, made famous last year due to misconceptions about its meaning, was re-dedicated yesterday by Chief Oren Lyons of the Iroquois tribe "by his presence and his talk, as well as through his prayers," said Mary Evelyn Tucker, professor of religion.

The sculpture was created by Frederick Franck two years ago as an interpretation of the Iroquois nation's conception of the Seven Generations, which celebrated the idea of bearing the interests of future generations in mind with every decision one makes.

According to Tucker, the Iroquois chiefs made decisions for the tribal nation with the interests in mind of seven generations into the future.

Tucker added that the sculpture, which will remain a permanent fixture at Bucknell, is important to the community in light of its connotations.

"Its presence is significant to connecting the native idea of making every decision with concern for the welfare of generations into the future. The understanding that Native Americans give us is that all life is sacred, and that the human depends on the animal and plant world for its own life," she explained.

Religion professor John Grim said the ceremony performed by Chief Lyons was extremely moving, although he understood little of what he said because he spoke in his native language.

"It was one of those moments that's hard to describe," he said. "[The Chief] was interested in how a white artist had presented the Seven Generations idea. He was fascinated by that.

"It was a beautiful moment," Grim added.

Grim said the Seven Generations sculpture marks the first time it has been presented in an artistic form, or as a physical representation.

Although the idea behind the Seven Generations stems from an age-old Iroquois tradition, the idea was not formally presented to the public until recently when Lyons wrote articles detailing the meaning behind the concept, Tucker said.

The sculpture, located between the Botany building and Kress Hall, is connected to the President's Forum series of lectures on the environment, as well as the Columbian Quincentennial program, Tucker concluded.

Solaida Mamsaarng—The Bucknellian

Fredrick Franck's Seven Generations sculpture was redicated on Thursday evening. Iroquois Chief Oren Lyons led the dedication ceremony. The sculpture was donated by Franck last spring.

Financial aid price setting by Overlap Group to affect Bucknell

BY JULIA STOUT

The September decision by a federal district judge which found Massachusetts Institute of Technology guilty of price setting with regard to financial aid allotment will affect the practices of schools not associated with the investigation, including Bucknell, according to Michael Moohr, chair and associate professor of economics.

This decision was the culmination of an ongoing controversy surrounding 23 of the nation's most distinguished universities and their financial aid decisions.

According to the September 9, 1992 issue of The Chronicle of Higher Education, this group of schools, collectively known as the Overlap Group and consisting of eight Ivy League universities, MIT and 14 other colleges in New England, New York, and Pennsylvania, met annually prior to 1989 to exchange certain data on prospective students.

During these meetings, the members reviewed the economic backgrounds of specific applicants and attempted to reach a collective agreement on the amount of financial aid each student should receive.

According to Richard Skelton, Dean of Enrollment Planning, this process guaranteed that a student applying to more than one of these colleges would not make a decision based upon differential aid packages.

"This way the aid packages offered to a student by several different colleges would look comparable," said Skelton.

According to Moohr, the member schools agreed that by implementing a financial aid system based solely upon economic need, they could offer assistance to a greater number of students.

While Bucknell was once informally associated with the Overlap Group prior to 1988, Skelton stated that "we focused only on a specific group of football players who might have been common applicants to one of the other Patriot League schools."

> "We focused only on a specific group of football players who might have been common applicants to one of the other Patriot League schools." — Richard Skelton, dean of enrollment planning

In 1989, the Justice Department initiated an investigation of the Overlap Group, asserting that these academic institutions were violating antitrust laws. The department contended that by their collusion the schools were preventing competition for financial aid, thereby hurting public welfare, particularly that of financial aid applicants.

According to Moohr, the implicated universities responded to these allegations by arguing that they were strictly nonprofit organizations, while the Antitrust laws were originally established to inhibit price-setting among for-profit organizations.

In addition, they questioned how they could be accused of exploiting prospective students when the distribution of financial aid is essentially a philanthropic activity.

"The Overlap Group admitted to exchanging data on applicants, but members contended that they colluded in order to ensure that the maximum number of qualified students could pursue higher education," said Moohr.

These groups originally assembled in the 1960s as many private colleges made commitments to diversify their student bodies. They used financial aid as a way in which to enable capable students to attend universities who for financial reasons would otherwise not be able to enroll.

However, Moohr explained that critics of the groups do not view their collusion as a philanthropic activity.

Rather, they contend that by engaging in these activities, private colleges had turned "diversification" into a commodity which they were then trying to buy as cheaply as possible.

Moohr describes this controversial issue as "terribly important. Without these organizations, institutions will start cheating, outbidding one another for students. By eliminating collusion, you'll get bidding wars so that fewer and fewer students will be aided."

Schools implicated by the Justice Department's investigation have agreed to suspend collusive activity and have promised not to exchange data on future applicants.

Interim discipline policy proposed

BY SARA WALKER

The current disciplinary system for students, which has not been changed for twenty-two years, is in the process of being revised. It is speculated, however, that this new system will not be implemented for at least a year and a half.

Sandi Green '93 and Jack Pyper, Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences, are the co-chairs of the current committee that is revising the present disciplinary system. This committee was formed early this semester and has met twice since then.

There are two options of what to do in the meantime, as explained by John Dunlop, Dean of Students. The first option is to adhere to the original disciplinary policy as described in the Personal Conduct Handbook. Since this is thought to be somewhat outdated and unsuccessful, another option has been chosen.

According to John Dunlop, dean of students, the aim of the Interim Disciplinary System is to guarantee a fair hearing to both parties and to enhance the role of students in the disciplinary process.

Dean Dunlop has proposed an Interim Disciplinary System. He describes it as "a modification of the current system" that will be in place until the new one is implemented.

Dunlop's proposal has been reviewed by the congress of the Bucknell Student Government and the Committee on Complimentary Activities. Both groups have made several suggestions and modifications.

> What is really wanted is "a disciplinary system that guarantees more student participation."
> — John Dunlop, dean of students

These revisions now need to be looked at and discussed by Barbara Shailor, Vice-president for Student Services, and Pyper, along with the University's General Council. This meeting will take place later this month.

The Interim Disciplinary System, as predicted by Dean Dunlop, will be installed second semester once the finishing touches have been added.

The main changes that will take place concern the structure of the Committee on Student Conduct.

Currently the committee is composed of twelve members: six undergraduate students, one graduate student, three faculty members, and two administrators. Dean Dunlop is the consultant to this group.

As it stands, seven people are needed to conduct a hearing. It can never be predicted who these seven people will be. It is possible that only two students will attend the hearing. This, therefore, defeats the goal of having a high level of student involvement.

According to Dean Dunlop, what is really wanted is "a disciplinary system that guarantees more student participation," as well as empower the students more than the present system.

The committee has therefore been reduced to five members.

It is mandatory that all five members be present in order to conduct a hearing. Three of these five members are students.

Students are the majority within this group so that maximum student involvement is guaranteed.

Another major change includes increased use of the Committee on Student Conduct. In his proposal, Dunlop divided the University's Personal Conduct Regulations into two categories according to severity.

The first group consists of serious violations, whereas the second category consists of violations of a lesser degree.

Serious violations are automatically sent to the Committee on Student Conduct.

Lesser violations can have the option to be handled administratively.

In the present system students always choose to have their violations handled administratively. This, therefore, defeats the purpose of student involvement.

Conditions as dictated in the Interim Disciplinary System will force decisions to be made among a body of peers.

Dunlop describes this as "a community decision, rather than an administrative one. where students have the larger voice."

The primary aims of the Interim Disciplinary System are to "guarantee a fair hearing to both parties, and that decisions are a consensus of community representatives, and finally to enhance the role of students," as described in Dunlop's proposal.

Public Safety chosen as model

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The progress that the department of public safety has made over the past two years was highlighted by today's visit by a delegation from the Princeton University department of public safety, which is evaluating its procedures using Bucknell's department as a basis for comparison, according to Vincent DeCerchio, director of public safety.

"They were looking for four or five schools with a university similar to theirs, as well as a public safety department." DeCerchio said that the fact that Bucknell public safety officers have police power on campus, which they "use only in the event of a serious problem which necessitates that we affect an immediate arrest," was one such basis of comparison.

However, DeCerchio said that this was not the only criteria. In fact, he said that with all the talk of Bucknell's "frame of reference" schools, he "considers it an honor that Jerrold Witsil (Princeton's director of public safety) has chosen our school," especially since, "Princeton University is supposed to have one of the best public safety departments in college and university security."

"It is less an academic comparison and more an administrative comparison, and as such it appears that we have gained a reputation for doing some things well, not many," said DeCerchio laughingly, "but some."

Princeton's department will be looking at two areas in particular for which Bucknell is nationally recognized said DeCerchio.

He described Bucknell's sexual assault policy as "one that everybody is looking to," including the Princeton delegation. "Our sexual assault policy which was developed by Barbara Shailor's office, with the assistance of Janice Butler and other members of the working committee, is probably one of the best in the country."

Furthermore, the "alcohol policy and enforcement procedures that have been built with the help of the Interfraternity Council and other student organizations is a model policy for enforcement and self-governance," said DeCerchio.

However, DeCerchio said that the alcohol policy is still far from perfect, and although it is "on its way to being a success, it's going to take a couple more years and a lot of work."

DeCerchio said that he is confident that schools will continue to use Bucknell's alcohol policy as a model through the years because "we have begun by building a strong foundation and Bucknell students are the key to the program's continuing success."

DeCerchio also said that the visit from the Princeton office may help Bucknell's department to "streamline some of our services." "I hope they will bring a critical eye with them."

publicans will rue the day they allowed Pat Robertson and Pat Buchanan to take over the Republican Convention."

She stated that it was "strategically stupid" for Bush to cater to the far right wing of the GOP, as they likely were not likely to vote for either Clinton or Perot even if they were unhappy with the President.

In contrast, Longley stated, "Clinton speaks to inclusion" and for voters who grew up during the times of the civil rights movement, the Vietnam war, assassinations, and exclusion based on gender and class, this message of inclusion and working together could be very appealing.

> "There has been an increased awareness and interest [in politics] among our age group."
> —Kirsten Olean '94

Longley claimed that the campaigns themselves had an effect on the outcome of the election, as he said, "quite clearly, the Bush campaign was not well-managed."

In addition to capturing a majority of the "Reagan Democrats" and the support of more first-time voters, veterans, and suburban voters than Bush did, Clinton gained 50% of the young voters, aged 18-29.

Neuman stated, "I hope the 18-24 year old vote went up this year," adding "I'd like to see the young people get more of a voice in our government."

According to Kirsten Olean '94, "there has been an increased awareness and interest [in politics] among our age group." She cited the strong efforts that MTV has undertaken in the past several months to encourage young people to both register and vote, the factual information provided by the station on the registration and voting processes, and opportunities for the candidates to express themselves to young voters.

Longley expressed support for the more direct means of communication between candidates and voters provided by the talk show format used by candidates appearing on Larry King Live and Donahue, but noted the possible drawback of candidates being able to manipulate talk show hosts who are entertainers by profession, not experienced news journalists.

He also said that MTV's political coverage was good in that "it speaks to a constituency that has been largely ignored."

Now that the election is over, Clinton will have to deal with several challenges early in his presidency, with the economy at the top of the list.

"Clinton will really have to hit the ground running," stated Neuman.

According to Greg Krohn, associate professor of economics, although interest rates have been quite low over the past year, it may be well into 1993 or even 1994 until the results of this expansionary monetary policy are seen.

He stated that many economists are now concerned about the slower-than-expected pace of the recovery, and thus are advocating some fiscal stimulus, which Clinton could perhaps implement.

Krohn stated that controlling health care costs and providing increased access to health care will be a major challenge facing the Clinton Administration, especially in light of deficit concerns. Neuman agreed that "Clinton must introduce a health care plan right away."

According to Krohn, "the pace of deficit reduction in Clinton's plan is modest enough so contractionary effects can be offset by expansionary monetary policy."

Longley claimed that "in contrast to other presidents [trying to] get the economy moving again, they did not have to deal with structural factors that the country currently has to contend with."

In the face of such problems as the deficit and aging infrastructure, Longley stated that Clinton's "prospects for short-term, tangible change" are probably not high.

Krohn agreed that certain factors will tend to continue to drag the economy down, such as the glut of office space (which serves as a drag on construction spending), reductions in defense spending, and the decreased expenditures of state and local governments.

As far as other predictions for what lies ahead in the Clinton presidency, Neuman stated that there will be "no more right-wing ideologues appointed to the Supreme Court" or to lower Federal courts.

She also predicted that the Family Leave Bill, vetoed by President Bush, will finally pass and the "gag rule" on abortion counseling at federally funded clinics will be overturned immediately.

Expressing surprise at what he termed a "sizable win" by Clinton, Jeffrey Dinard '93, president of the College Republicans, stated that "I hope for our sake [Clinton] does an incredible job."

Katie Malague '94, president of the College Democrats, stated, "In listening to the concession and acceptance speeches, I liked the bipartisan tone" and added that she believes Clinton must work in a bipartisan manner.

Although the election is over, both the College Republicans and the College Democrats are planning future activities to keep the campus informed and involved in politics.

News Briefs

On Campus

Knight fellowhips granted

Applications for the Knight/Bucknell summer fellowship program are now available from departmental offices of the humanities and social sciences and from at the Alumni House.

Applicants will present a plan for the summer of 1993 that involves cooperative work on the part of the student and a member of the faculty who teaches the humanities or social sciences.

Applications are due to psychology professor Douglas Candland by February 8, 1993.

Bucknell supports the March of Dimes

The March of Dimes' largest fundraiser, WalkAmerica, will be held in Lewisburg on Sunday, November 8. Panhel and the InterFraternity Council is sponsoring the ten kilometer walk that will circumvent the campus.

Funds raised from the event will will benefit the Foundation's Campaign for Healthier Babies. It will also increase the amounts of grant monies available in northeast Pennsylvania.

Schloss gives Class of '56 lecture

Marc Scholss, associate professor of anthropology, will give the annual Class of 1956 Lecture Monday, November 9 at 8 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

Schloss will discuss "Secret Bodies and Sexual Dangers in an African Society." He conducted his field research in the Lower Casamance region of Senegal and is the author of "The Hatchet's Blood: Separation, Power and Gender in Ehing Social Life."

The lecture is free and open to the public.

President's Forum concludes

The President's Forum series on The Environmental Perspective will conclude with a lecture by James W. McNeill and Robert F. Kennedy, Jr.

The final lecture will be held Thursday, November 19 from 4 to 5 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

Postdoctoral fellowships offered

Applications are now being accepted for three postdoctoral fellowships sponsored by the U. S. Department of Energy's Office of Health and Environmental Research.

The Alexander Hollaender, Human Genome, and the Global Change Distinguished Postdoctoral Fellowship awards will be made by June 1993.

Interested applicants may contact the Science/Engineering Education Division of the Oak Ridge Institute for Science and Education in Oak Ridge, Tennessee.

Bond lecture to be presented

The annual Bond Lecture will be presented by Charles Long Wednesday, November 11 at 7 p.m. in the Langone Center Forum.

The lecture, "New Space, New Time: Disjunctions and Context for a New World Religion," will examine the celebration of the Columbian Quincentennial in the United States. Long will also pose the problem of a new kind of study for the cultures and peoples of the New World.

The Bond Lecture is named in honor of Charles M. Bond, former professor of religion, and Elizabeth S. Bond.

Harvard offers AIDS compensation

Harvard University and its affiliated health centers will provide a $100,000 payment to any of its physicians, medical assistants or health-care workers who become infected with the AIDS virus while at work.

The insurance, reportedly the first of its kind, will be provided at no cost to over 50,000 employess at fourteen affiliated health centers. what extent the person shows physical symptoms of AIDS.

USC linebacker shot before practice

A linebacker on the University of Southern California football team was struck by a stray bullet while waiting for football practice to begin. The freshman student-athlete was hospitalized after being hit in the left arm by a bullet fired from about a quarter-mile away.

Police said an off-campus bicyclist fired several rounds at a passing car. He hit his intended target, and one of the bullets continued to fly until it hit the student.

The USC campus is located south of downtown Los Angeles. Officials said the shooting was a freak accident and do not plan any increase in campus security.

Berkeley changes policies

The University of California at Berkeley's law school has agreed to change its admission policies so that it will no longer violate civil rights laws. Since 1968, the law school has maintained separate waiting lists for different ethnic groups, including African Americans and Asian Americans.

The school changed to a single waiting list in 1989, but students were still listed by ethnic origin.

Beer policy reinstated

Rochester Institute of Technology officials hope that a more lenient alcohol policy will help control drinking among students and problem drinkers. Opponents of the old policy said that it "drove the drinking underground."

A feature of the new policy is that students will not be cited for drinking in residence halls unless they are intoxicated.

Members of the group Sweet Honey in the Rock (l to r) Shirley Childress Johnson, Bernice Johnson Reagon, Ysaye M. Barnwell, Carol Lynne Maillard, Aisha Kahlil, and Nitanju Bolade Casel. A combination of soulful voices and hand-held instruments, the ensemble will perform Sunday night in the Weis Center. Tickets are $7.50 (free with a BUID) and available through the Weis Center Box Office.

Their songs speak of being fighters, of being in love, of social injustice, and of being women. Their voices, unaccompanied except for body and hand percussion instruments, blend into harmonious strings that are reminiscent of a soulful combination of jazz, blues, rap, and gospel. And Sunday night, Sweet Honey in the Rock offers a unique musical style to the campus.

The performance, to be held in the Weis Center, will start at 7:30 p.m.. Tickets are $7.50 (free with a BUID) and available at the Weis Center Box Office. The performance will be signed for the hearing impaired.

A quintet of electrifying vocalists, the group features a variety of musical styles, including blues, early 20th-century gospel, and jazz, and touches on many controversial issues such as rascism, sexism, and civil rights.

"Most people who come to our music understand that they are part of a radical cultural statement," said Bernice Johnson Reagon, the group's leader, "You can't pretend that we're not black, that we're not women, that we don't sing religious songs as well as songs about racism, military intervention, life, death, and love."

Founded in 1973 by Reagon, the group became internationally recognized for making legendary music. Current members of Sweet Honey are Bernice Johnson Reagon, Ysaye M. Barnwell, Carol Lynne Maillard, Aisha Kahlil, and Nitanju Bolade Casel. Also appearing with the group is Shirley Childress Johnson, sign language interpreter.

Although the group claims a large grassroots following, their efforts have not gone unnoticed in the entertainment industry. Thier 1988 performance of "Emergency" from their release Live at Carnegie Hall won them a Grammy award.

Other recordings of Sweet Honey in the Rock include Breaths, a compilation of some of the group's most striking songs, and In This Land, their latest release. Sunday night's concert will draw from some of the group's favorite recordings, as well as from their latest.

The ensemble's recent concert in Orange, California was praised by the Los Angles Times. Said Mike Boehm, Times staff writer, "There were gorgeous moments of harmony in which Sweet Honey's waft of sound transported a listener somewhere beyond this world. There were also aching plaints and fiery protest songs that made vivid the passions and pain of the here-and-now."

Sunday night's performance should prove no exception to the reputation that the group has collected for themselves. Everyone is encouraged to attend and experience the strength and power in these women's voices.

Sweet Honey in the Rock is cosponsored by the Association for the Arts, the Women's Resource Center, Bucknell Concert Committee, African-American Cultural Society, Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, the NAACP, and the Multicultural Center.

Alumnus returns with gift of words

As an undergraduate, Thomas Gardner '74 impressed many with his personality and work ethic. Gardner returns to campus on Wednesday, November 11 to share his poetry, as well as his knowledge in criticism and critical theory of the genre. The event will start at 8:15 p.m. in Bucknell Hall.

Jack Wheatcroft, professor in the department of English, said of Gardner, "He cared very much for what he did. He did it (his work) as his own to do and he enjoyed doing it."

While at Bucknell, Gardner excelled as both an English student and as a member of the track team. Wheatcroft witnessed Gardner's talent in his poetry seminar and workshop.

"As an undergraduate you sensed that tremendous energy, dedication, and discipline (in Gardner)," said Wheatcroft. "You saw it in Tom as a student of literature and also as a writer of poetry."

Gardner's talents enabled him to produce forms from his imagination. He sees the finely disciplined athlete as a form of an artist. His poem "Sprint" is just a small example of his creative mastery.

Gardner started running the same year that coach Art Gulden first began coaching the men's track team at Bucknell. Gulden remembers Gardner as "a walk-on freshman who wanted to run. He was not one of our top five runners, but he always had an intense desire to compete and improve. He was always very enthusiastic and trying to do the best that he could do or be the best that he could be. I don't think you can say anything better about an athlete. Tom had a great work ethic and always gave it his best."

After his years at Bucknell, Gardner went on to receive an MFA from Syracuse University and a Ph.D from the University of Wisconsin. He has published two books, The Mime, Speaking and Discovering Ourselves in Whitman.

The bulk of Gardner's poetry is contained in The Mime, Speaking. Discovering Ourselves in Whitman discusses the struggles Whitman had in finding words to express his ineffable being and how other contemporary poems reflect Whitman's influence.

Gardner has written numerous articles on critical theory in nationally recognized journal. His teaching at the Virginia Polytechnical Institute and State University has earned him three Awards of Teaching Excellence. Currently Gardner is working on his third book.

Gardner will be giving a seminar in criticism and critical theory in the C. Willard Smith Library in Vaughan Lit at 5 p.m. on Wednesday as well. Both the seminar and the later reading in Bucknell Hall are free and open to the public.

Two cheers for Albert Nobbs

BY MARILYN R. MUMFORD

Director Gary Grant and the department of theatre and dance are to be congratulated on their recent production of The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs by Simone Benmussa.

Adapted from a short story in George Moore's Celibate Lives, the play is based on the tortured life of a head waiter in a Dublin hotel in the late nineteenth century. After the waiter's death, it is discovered that "he" is actually a "she," a woman who has cross-dressed for all of her adult life in order to earn a decent living wage.

Congratulations are in order in part due to the choice of the play. Not only was a somewhat transgressive play performed at Bucknell, but it was performed on a Parents Weekend, often the occasion for more traditional theatrical fare. And the company achieved an almost professional production of a difficult play.

Grant's skillful direction was obvious in the lively pace (this play could drag in more than one sense), in the subtle interactions between characters and the invisible presences who often intruded into their space, and in the self-confidence and charm of the characterizations.

Elaine Williams' set was spectacular—one of the most fully satisfying stage designs I have seen at Bucknell. It caputred perfectly the faintly-musty, self-consciously "proper" air of a turn-of-the-century Dublin hotel. The three tiers of vertical space, as well as the magical swinging doors, opened up more space for the actors than one would have thought possible.

The lighting and sound designers, Steven Drabeim, Andrea Preschle '94, and David B. Ames '94, are also to be commended for working out creative solutions to some of the technical problems posed by the play: how to create a "frame" for the voices of off-stage narrators, how to convey interior lighting in one scene and the light of evening on a Dublin street in the next.

All of which brings us to the actors, whose performance, after all, can make or break the production. With certain limitations, I found the acting in Albert Nobbs quite remarkable for a student production.

Theater Review

The chambermaids, Joanna Fassl '95 and Vanessa Jones '95, were just right in their Victorian costumes, with quaint curtseys at the end of each brief appearance. Sober and just a shade saucy at the same time, these two women literally set the stage for the sometimes comic, sometimes pathetic life story being played out behind them.

Wendy Milliman '95 played Mrs. Baker with strength and subtlety, aided by a magnificent skirt which she swirled around her like a queen's train. Jessica Alexander '95 was appropriately brassy as Helen Dawes, a young woman no better than she ought to be.

The two principles, Mary Jordan '93 as Hubert Page and Valerie K. Marsden '93 as Albert Nobbs, had by far the most difficult roles in the play. Both were playing women who had supposedly convinced all their acquaintances that they were men. At certain moments they succeeded, but for me the attempt was not quite successful. I think this was due in part to the physiology, and, in Hubert's case, in part to the costume.

It was not so much that either Marsden or Jordan's masculine persona was unconvincing, but more that a necessary emotional tension between them, and an even more crucial tension between Marsden's character and Alexander's, was not present. After all, this is a play about women who fall in love with, are romantically attracted to, other women. In order for the play to succeed, that attraction must sizzle and sting; it must dominate the stage. Although Jordan and especially Marsden made heroic efforts, that dynamic did not emerge in their performance.

However much of the problem is due to the play rather than to any fault of the actors. The arbitrary death of Albert Nobbs, followed immediately by the arrival of Hubert after an absence of several years, is not the most subtle wrap-up in modern drama. I don't know how the director or the actors could have got around this rather contrived conclusion.

Within the limitations of the material they were working with, Grant and his cast and the production crew put together one of the most enjoyable evenings of theater I have seen at Bucknell.

Marilyn Mumford, professor of English, frequently teaches women's literature and feminist literary criticism courses.

Gallery hosts Toby Twining Music

Members of the group Toby Twining Music will perform as part of the Gallery Series in the Langone Center Gallery on Tuesday. Admittance to all Gallery Serie concerts are free and open to the public.

The Gallery Series will present the second in a series of four performances that showcase performance art and experimental music on Tuesday, November 10. Toby Twining Music, an a cappella quartet, will perform at 8 p.m. in the Center Gallery of the Elaine Gallery of the Elaine Langone Center.

Featuring soprano Lisa Bielawa, countertenor, Toby Twining, tenor Jim Desmond, and baritone Greg Purnhagen, the quartet is based on Twining's belief that the human voice is the most versatile, expressive musical instrument.

Tuesday evening's program, titled "Mouth Music," will include works that mix vocal performance with dance and movement techniques, a process which is known as kinetic music. Creative harmonies and unusual techniques that range from panting to yodeling are combined to create a sound that is unique to the New York-based quartet.

Founded in 1989 as "Mouth Music," the group has performed in Seoul, Korea with the American Dance Festival. The quartet evolved into Toby Twining Music in 1991 when founder and member Twining decided to include instrumental and kinetic works as part of the group's repertoire. Tobe Twining Music has worked with such choreographers as Gus Solomons, Jr. and Mariko Okamoto.

The Gallery Series is sponsored by Meet the Composer and the department of music. All concerts are free and open to the public.

A self-made actress, Bloom has toured many one-woman shows such as The Turn of the Screw, Mrs. Dalloway, and Shakespeare's Women.

Her production tonight will include portrayals of Viola (Twelfth Night), Desdemona (Othello), Portia (Julius Caesar), Katherine (King Henry VIII), and Juliet (Romeo and Juliet).

Married to Philip Roth, a Bucknell graduate and noted author, the couple claims to have much in common: a love of books and music, an instinct for high drama, a sense of the comic, and a devotion to Shakespeare and Henry James.

Roth first saw Bloom 40 years ago while he was an undergraduate at Bucknell. Having gone to see Limelight, he never took his eyes off the attractive young co-star. They met some years later at a friend's house in East Hampton. Bloom admits, "I thought he was terribly handsome."

Their paths crossed again some years after, and the rest, as they say, is history. Roth and Bloom have homes in New York City and Connecticut, and spend part of each year in London.

Bloom's appearance is sponsored in part by the Bucknell Association for the Arts and Cap and Dagger.

EDITORIAL

Want to witness results? Voice your opinion

A little energy, a little drive, a little vocalism and looks what happens. A change occurs.

Recently we witnessed this phenomenon both on the national and local level. More citizens, especially those in the 18–24 year-old age group, cast votes than ever before. They felt dissatisfaction about the way the country was being run and voiced their opinions. Thus, this week we have a different President than the week before.

On campus, many students were unhappy about the new academic calendar. For varied reasons, it did not suit their personal needs and ambitions.

Many wondered how the re-calendaring decision was completed. Many wondered how the University was run. Others questioned the authority of those who did the decision-making. Did they take popular opinion into account when debating the options?

As Bucknell students learned this week, sometimes one has to speak up in order to be heard. Constructive telephone calls have to be made, meetings must be attended, well-thought letters to the editor must be written.

Leaders typically have a difficult time listening. Unless you speak up and voice an opinion, it is very unlikely that change will occur. Continuing the status quo is much simpler and safer.

Granted, some decision-makers are more hard of hearing than others (Bush just realized Tuesday night that he needed a hearing aid). For this reason, we should be thankful that the faculty took student opinion into consideration on the re-calendaring issue. While it was the politically smart and ethically right thing to do, not all leaders oblige.

Approximately 40% of the nation, including many on campus, are not happy about Governor Clinton becoming a President. They should, however, take pride in the sheer number of opinions that were expressed about the candidates and their stance on the issues. President-elect Clinton won the popular vote.

Many involved with Bucknell may not agree with the newest academic calendar. Our January break or finals period may be too long for them. Maybe the compromise that was concluded that takes into account the voice of the student-athletes does not suit everyone, but who spoke up?

It's often repeatedly redundantly during election time, but it really holds true for the rest of the year and on all issues and decisions: If you don't speak up, you have no reason to complain later.

There's no better time to learn to voice your opinion than in college. The University is supposed to be an open forum atmosphere. Classrooms, multiple student publications, and even faculty and administration meetings await your voice. Break the mold of the apathetic '80's student and use it. Strive for laryngitis.

Power Speaks

TO THE EDITOR:

Last Friday you may have noticed the chalk-writings on the academic quad. These quotes were written by the Partnership of Women Engaged in Revolution (POWER). It is POWER's belief that women and other oppressed groups need to stand up against the heterosexist, white, male-dominated society. We are working for a time when all peoples, no matter what their gender, race, sexual orientation, or class, can feel free to be themselves and be treated with respect, dignity, and without discrimination. The chalk-talk was meant to spur discussion and also to affirm and empower women.

POWER requests that people read our message instead of asking the irrelevant question, "Who did it?". We wish to remain anonymous because we feel that our actions are more important than our identities. In a time when social injustices run rampant, we can no longer remain silent.

Coach urges increased promotion of social responsibility on campus

TO THE EDITOR

Having been a part of Bucknell University for the past twenty-eight years and, more recently, a member of the University Committee on Illegal Drugs and Alcohol, I feel a necessity to speak to the issue of the University's public relation effort as it relates to substance abuse by prospective Bucknellians–specifically alcohol abuse.

The issues of social responsibility should become a part of the image of Bucknell. We should be sending a message to prospective students and their families...

My thought is that the University needs to project its substance abuse policies and expectations to prospective students through its recruitment and admission literature, as well as, including this topic in all Admissions Office presentations to prospective students.

The issues of social responsibility should become a part of the image of Bucknell. We should be sending a message to prospective students and their families that not only are we a top academic institution with a superb teaching faculty and physical plant, but that we take seriously a commitment on the part of students to insure that our campus environment is socially responsible. This is not to say that it is not. But, if you read the number of alcohol related incidents each week on campus, you will find a disturbing type of activity and number of incidents which have the potential for personal disaster not to mention the effect it has on uninvolved individuals.

My point is: Wouldn't it be in our best interest to more fully state the University's position on social responsibility to prospective students before they arrive on campus each year?

FLAG&B defends Jeans Day, explains purpose

TO THE EDITOR:

A letter in last week's Bucknellian had "a problem" with Jeans Day, which was on October 30. The members of FLAG & B (Friends of Lesbians, Gays, and Bisexuals) wish to explain to you the purposes of Jeans Day, and the reasons why you should do it.

In wearing jeans on this day, you support your friends who are gays, lesbians, and bisexuals, and you support the rights they should have as Americans.

1. Jeans Days are not our idea—they have been held yearly, all over the United States, since 1971. FLAG & B is not an isolated group—we are part of a worldwide movement of gays, lesbians, bisexuals, and heterosexual allies. Jeans Day has a history, and we wish to get Bucknell involved as a part of this national event.

2. Everyone already has a pair of jeans. Wearing them on Jeans Day is thus a very easy yet important thing for people to do.

3. We want everyone to have the chance to participate in Jeans Day. Distributing buttons for a "Button Day" would be both costly and impractical, because we would reach only a small portion of the people who would like to participate.

4. Face it, denim goes with everything.

5. The abuse that gays, lesbians, and bisexuals take from individuals and society at large is being ignored. Jeans Day cannot be ignored, because everyone who knows about it must make a decision.

6. The decision you make on Jeans Day is very important to many of your friends, as well as many of the people who see you that day. Many gays, lesbians, and bisexuals understandably feel threatened by people who aren't willing to put on a pair of jeans to stand up for them.

7. We wish to confront the stereotype that putting on jeans means that you're "one of them." Hundreds of people who wore jeans last week were straight people supporting their friends. It's silly (and impossible) to guess about someone's sexuality based on what they wear, don't you think?

We wish to confront the stereotype that putting on jeans means that you're "one of them." Hundreds of people who wore jeans last week were straight people supporting their friends.

8. We realize that many people put on jeans "accidentally" last Friday. At some point, though, they certainly read a sign and remembered what day it was. The decision they then faced is another important part of Jeans Day. Everyone needs to think about homosexuality and bisexuality, not just those who remember when they get dressed.

9. The common word on Jeans Day signs was "support." At the time of the Persian Gulf War, though many people opposed the war, nearly everyone supported the individual soldiers involved. Can those who hold "moral absolutes" against homosexuality please do the same?

10. Jeans Day is fairly unique in that it involves the entire Bucknell community. People of all genders, races, class, ages, and sexual orientations can wear jeans. Students, faculty, administrators, and staff can wear them too.

11. Jeans Day is a chance to talk about homosexuality and bisexuality, a matter so vitally important to so many people. A person can wear more supportive symbols, such as the color pink, or tee shirts, to present other messages. People opposed can write to the Bucknellian. In any case, people finally talk about it. This, to me personally, is the most valuable part of the day.

The next Jeans Day at Bucknell will be held in the spring. Hopefully those who were confused this year will consider our reasons and participate next time.

Student criticizes lack of hall etiquette, offers easy reminders

TO THE EDITOR:

It is time to address the traffic problem off the streets and in the halls. Why do college students, most of whom are licensed drivers somewhere in the U. S., consistently obstruct passageways?

I propose a basic flow not unlike Pennsylvania highways, only without the potholes. Stay to the right unless you plan to pass. Remain clear of blind spots, i.e., do not walk side by side; you are blocking other people. Make smooth turns, do not change direction so abruptly that others could collide.

More importantly, our campus community must address hallway socialization and other standstill formations. The student mailroom contains limited space. Keep constant motion by forming lanes of traffic. Check your box, empty it, recycle what you wish, and get out. Continue motion until you have left the crowd. If a friend wants to talk, politely move to an unpopulated area. When surrounded, rotate before advancing, to prevent surprises.

Although minute, these changes offer greater ease for everyone involved. Common sense can eliminate "spilled books," "stupid idiots!" and "excuuuse me!" statements.

Now, will Public Safety be willing to issue those orange vests to students returning from England?

OPINIONS

The war is over

BY ANDREW COHEN

I rolled out of bed on Armistice Day, Wednesday November 4, 1992, groggy and disoriented. I could not believe it was over. I ran to the television and checked CNN Headline News. This was no dream, it was true. I was filled with glee.

I wanted to taunt the losers: the bible-belters who would put me in hell for my opinion, the ignorant whose only experience with hardship was when daddy needed to borrow their car for the day, the all-around jerks whose eyes are a lovely shade of dollar sign, and those I thought were simply "ill-informed," i.e. those who do not fit under these tidy and trite classifications. We had fought each other for five months; the battle lines were clearly drawn so that it was easy to pick out the winners from the losers. And yes, we had won the war, or had we?

There was a cataclysmic sense of urgency associated with the outcome of the presidential election by supporters of both sides. While my Democratic friends and I were making travel plans to Canada in the event of a Bush victory, Republicans lamented the moral and economic doomsday which would necessarily follow a Clinton victory.

Clearly our founding fathers would be impressed by the degree to which the public participated in the election. However, would they have envisioned that the only remedy for voter apathy was the sincere belief by both political parties that the other side represented a threat to the essence of American society?

While both major party candidates bear some responsibility for propagating this doomsday scenario, in a democracy, the onus is always on the people. The way that we talked about the so-called issues was characterized by anger, inaccuracy, and sweeping leaps of logic, on both sides.

Our information was disseminated mainly through self-promoting commercials as well as the sound bites that comprise the nightly news. People eschewed what George Will calls the first draft of history, the newspaper, as an information source. Is it a wonder that almost all of the public debate was attended by the fluff that the television age promotes? Jingles such as "trickle-down economics" and "tax-and-spend liberal" dominated public and private discussion.

The myth of television has become our reality as we now decide that we "hate" or "can't trust" people whom we have never met. By failing to inform ourselves to any substantive extent, we have failed our primary public obligation: to educate ourselves about the matters of government.

Yes, Houston was Bush's Appomattox. But the wounds of the nation still run deep. Now more than ever is the time for more public participation, not less. Electoral victory will not heal the wounds of this war. The only lasting victory comes from tolerance and peace. We have to make room for everyone.

That does not mean that differences should not arise, so long as we are true to our duty: to educate ourselves. Part of that education is learning to work toward a common goal with others, even those with whom we disagree.

The "winners" can not afford to turn their backs on the other side. And the "losers" only turn their back on their country if they write off the next four years and look ahead to 1996. In fact, there should be no winners or losers. And the stakes should never be as high as we thought they were in the War of '92.

Sexual double standards must be challenged

BY SAMANTHA SCHIVERS

Whore. Slut. Tease.

No doubt these are all words made up by some deranged male psyche. (Who else would waste a perfectly good letter like "w" on a perfectly boring word like "whore" and not even pronounce it but a man?) I mean can you see a woman sitting back and saying, "Okay, let's think of a label that we can use to torture an entire gender with and hopefully cause enough fear to drive thousands of people into sexual repression." No—definitely male territory here.

I do not think I have gone through one day at college without some guy jokingly requesting oral sex.

I will admit I think everybody at one time or another has been a whore, slut, or tease, but this applies equally to men. I know more male whores than I do female whores. Yet, the word is always associated with women. And where are the comparable words for males? Have I been living oblivious to an entire genre of fun little words, or do they just not exist? Well, if they do not, they should.

I know, I know. Sounds a little like reverse prejudice. But, I do not care. I am tired of having to make sure I do not say something that might be too suggestive — for fear of being pigeonholed as easy. I am tired of having to pretend not to be aroused in case it might make some guy get ideas. I am tired of having to make it clear to men that dinner is not synonymous with sex. I am just plain tired of having to deal with all of the macho male baggage that goes along with taking care of men.

Let me ask you something. When was the last time you heard a women blatantly joke around with her male friends [about her sexual exploits]? It just does not happen, because women are afraid that the men think they are serious. But, notice that males have no such aversion. I do not think I have gone through one day at college without some guy jokingly requesting oral sex. Correct me if I am wrong, but is that proper etiquette? Would Ms. Manners approve of an eighteen year-old asking a woman for a [oral sex] after she borrowed a pencil from him? I'll have to look that one up.

And it's not just me.

And it's not just one guy, either.

And you can not file a sexual harassment complaint against the entire male sex. I have tried. Well, okay, so I haven't. But I know it can't be done.

Students must find diversity within

BY CRISTINA TISA

Diversity in this country is typically measured in terms of race. Judging by that criteria we do not belong to a very diverse campus. However, to say that we are not a diverse campus is to say that we are all the same, and with this I cannot agree.

Perhaps I exist in a unique environment because I live in Leiser House, which is part of the International Residential College program. I consider myself lucky to have been placed in this residence because only half of us (ten people) were even born in the United States, half of the house has dual citizenship, most of us have traveled extensively, and more than half the students living there speak one or more foreign languages fluently: French, Japanese, German, Italian, Korean, Spanish, and Greek among them. Yet 80% of us "Leiser People" reside in the states, and would be classified as being white. We represent various cities in New York, New Jersey, Georgia, Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania.

Instead of complaining about a problem that is...well, frankly non-existent, we should use the resources at hand.

We are a very close house, and conversations have often revolved around the issue of diversity. Most of us agree that diversity does not rest only in the clothes one wears, the color of one's skin, or the shape of one's eyes. It can be found where it truly matters, and that is in the mind and the heart. In this way we are all of us, different. Even from state to state, or city to city. My friend Neil currently lives in Atlanta, Georgia, and has never lived further north than Indiana. I have lived in Rochester, New York all my life. No one can tell me that we have the same mentality.

Even if I move outside my house I can find diversity of the same kind. Hulley House, my next door neighbor, houses fifteen men. One man in particular has only recently become a United States citizen, and claims dual citizenship with his native Brazil. The RA cannot even name all of his ethnic origins, and has lived in two or three different countries. Another man has a diverse ethnicity, African-American and French among them. Furthermore, in Harris and Vedder halls I can point out Greek, South African, Indian, Pakistani, and Middle Eastern descendants. Even fraternities claim their share of ethnically diverse students, Finnish, Middle Eastern, and others among them.

My point is, I hope, well exemplified. To claim that we fail to satisfy the need for diversity is almost absurd. I suppose I can even be a bit offended by such a remark, as can every student here. This is not to say that racial diversity isn't important, but it is only an aspect of the total picture.

Instead of complaining about a problem that is...well, frankly nonexistent, we should use the resources that are at hand. Talk to your friends. I doubt any of them have the same ethnic background and upbringing that you do. We all have different philosophies about life, different customs pertaining to food and family, different cultural heritages. These things give us a unique perspective on life. The sky is a different shade of blue to everyone.

Appreciate the diversity we do have. Conduct a cultural exchange. Spend a semester abroad. Participate in the ethnic programs the university sponsors. Do what you have to do but do not walk blindly anymore. Search for the variety among the faces of your friends. It is there, I promise you. Tell that to the Princeton College Review.

The point

Student battles typecasting

In most forms of artistic presentation, a modest amount of success quickly leads to the dreaded phenomenon of the "type-cast": a morass of expectation from which only a fortunate few escape. However, as anyone who saw Sheena Easton in "Man Of La Mancha" will testify to, this doesn't mean that those with more singular abilities will accept their fate with any sort of grace or dignity. No, they never quite accept that they have found a "niche," striving to break through the boundaries defined by self-proclaimed critics and pundits. And so they should. After all, who the hell was Adam to decide that a horse should be called "a horse" of course, and that this decision was, in fact, "good"?

This pithy bit of pseudo-philosophy showers through my mind as I confront my latest Bucknellian dilemma. It seems that after a series of articles covering the bathing endeavors of a certain Dean of Residential Life, my writing assignments have been suspiciously one-dimensional.

"Why don't you talk about the origin of the shower as a social institution?" was one editorial suggestion which I politely refused.

"How about, 'Showers and Jesus: the divine parallel?'" a member of C.A. pitched.

"Or even, '101 uses for an adjustable nozzle?'" a third helper chimed in.

No, I decided. My next article would discuss the baron futility of Trickle Down Economics—a system which lacks the power to wash away that dirty deficit. In fact, when you think about it, the whole situation could be compared to a...

This is more serious than I thought. The dilemma of the "type-cast" has imbued into my consciousness, stripping me of non shower-related themes and cleansing away my creativity. Caught in this singular quagmire of inspiration, I am starting to remember all the people I have been guilty of "type-casting," over the years. Hank Ross was one of the first.

Perhaps it was the unpleasant gastric nature of my cafateria-eating freshman year, or the catering stories I'd heard about over-priced cheese nuggets and stale coffee grounds, but my summation of Mr. Ross was that he was greasier than a chicken-burger before any significant amount of blotting.

So, indeed, I was shocked beyond all peristalsis when I wandered into the cafeteria (searching for non shower-oriented writing material) and discovered that Hank was actually, I am not making this up, LADLING SOUP! That's right. The despot of dining services was out there in the front line, braving the whining worst of the first year masticators.

"You seem to be an expert ladler," I informed Mr. Ross, attempting to bait him into a controversial response. "I'd definitely hire you."

"Ha, ha," Mr. Ross said. Then he smiled good-naturedly, allowing me a normally forbidden combination of main courses. I couldn't believe it. What a guy!

"Oh, yes! Hank Ross really does care about the kids," a Bison full-timer explained to me, after I mentioned my unusual dining experience. "He really does. And I'm not just saying that because he's my boss."

"Well, that's good," I told her. "Because I'm actually a spy for Mr. Ross. I've been instructed to sniff out and report any potential trouble makers."

"Ha, ha," she said.

So, to summarize an arduous string of interviews and research, I discovered that Hank Ross isn't such a bad guy after all. I feel good about this discovery—refeshed, relaxed, invigorated. Like right after you take a steaming hot sho.....

But on to the point of all this. I would venture that I am not the only Bucknell student who has been guilty of the loathsome type-cast. God knows, we make it as easy as a cap or a sweat shirt or even word of mouth. It becomes the basis for major social decisions, encouraging people to outwardly provide evaluators with an expected behavior and inwardly justify spurious actions by labeling themselves "secretly deep."

And the potential cure for all this does not lie in the semi-sincere orations of intoxication or the rhythmic squeaking of the whisper-drowning bed spring. Communication is all we need. Let's dare to let our conversations wander outside the boundaries of weekday stress and weekend regurgitations.

And speaking of regurgitation, this is where you come in, Mr. Ross. It is a universal fact that food is the ultimate conversational lubricant—easily chewable food, that is. So why not demonstrate your benevolence by offering special "Eating Incentives" to catalyst communication.

Here's how it would work. After a group of no more than three people has finished a delicious Bison meal, they will recieve special "Conversation Rating" cards. If the mealtime chat has featured mention of clothes, cars, classes, sports, alcohol, gossip, or Bucknell's vastly underrated alternative newspaper, the meal recieves a rating of "one fork" and no discount is recieved. If the repartee includes talk of movies, theater, loved ones, hobbies, literature, and philosophy, the group gets a rating of "two forks" and a modest fifteen percent discount will be extended. Now, if there is any coherent deliberation of politics, values, religion, gender-dynamics, conflicting paradigms of collegiate culture, or the latest issue of The Bucknellian, a "three fork" rating is assigned and the meal is 100% free.

What do you think, Mr. Ross? What's that? We students should have the desire, ability, and maturity to attempt legitimate communication without culinary incentive? My brilliant idea is ludicrous—juvenile even? You're right. I'm humiliated that I even suggested it. And yet another comunicative risk has been shot down. I'm beginning to truly understand the womblike, silent safety of the shower.

Football team questioned

TO THE EDITOR:

As a Bucknell alumna, parent of a junior, and long-time supporter of the Bison, I was appalled by the rudeness demonstrated by the football team at the Parents' Weekend game. If I am not mistaken, the Athletic Department invited the Shikillamy Marching Band to perform before the game to provide entertainment for the audience. Before they finished their show, we witnessed the extremely offensive behavior of the team as they ran on the field, obviously frightening several of the band members.

I found the football team's ill-mannered action to be extremely embarrassing. I hope that in the future the team would have the courtesy to wait until the pre-game show was completed before taking the field. I certainly feel that the Shikellamy Band and their Director are owed an apology.

Student warns of Clinton/Gore doomsday

TO THE EDITOR:

So it finally happened. "Slick Willie" Clinton, and Albert "The sky is falling" Gore are in for the next four years, and the majority of Bucknellians seem to be delirious with joy. And I just have one question for them, "Why?".

Are you happy about the $150 billion in new taxes you now face? Are you happy about the $1 billion proposed by Albert to save the Mexican environment? Or maybe you're just happy that we now have the grooviest president ever. After all, its not everyday a toker who hooks up a lot gets to be president.

I don't want to rain on the collective parade currently consuming this once conservative campus, but let's consider some other individuals who probably smoked a bone in Bill's honor Tuesday night.

How about Sadaam Hussein? He probably detonated a warhead he was so happy. No more deterrent force in the Middle East, no more promise of swift justice for violating international agreements. There was a hell of a party in Baghdad that night.

How about Sadaam Hussein? He probably detonated a warhead he was so happy. No more deterrent force in the Middle East, no more promise of swift justice for violating international agreements.

Or how about the Japanese? They get to watch the U.S. economy be slowly crushed to death by enormous taxes and insane inflation rates like a python wrapped around its prey.

So celebrate, Bucknell. Eat, drink, and be merry. Revel in your victory, because as sure as the sun will rise, it won't last. In your haste to rid yourselves of an admittedly lacking president, you embraced a far inferior product. I truly hope I'm wrong, but somehow, I see visions of 1978 and 1979 looming in the future. Well, I'll either see you on the battlefield or the unemployment line, but until then, remember these sage words from Winston Churchill: "If a man is not a liberal at 21, he has not heart, if he is not a conservative at 40, he has no mind."

Well, maybe I have no heart, but as Henry Clay put it: "I'd rather be right than president."

Astrology: Hoax or a sign of the times?

BY CARYN AKELAITIS AND COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Do the words "Hey, baby. What's your sign?" mean anything to you? Aside from being a cliche pickup line, the words go much deeper into an area that some choose to dismiss while others opt to grasp. The area is the mysterious and enchanting world of astrology.

The earliest records of this age-old art date back to the ancient civilizations of Babylon and Assyria around 3,000 B.C. The people of this time believed that celestial bodies were directly related to deities. Five wandering planets,—Jupiter, Saturn, Mars, Mercury and Venus,—came to be identified with the five major gods of the time: Marduk, Ninib, Nergal, Venus and Ishtar. People charted the movement of the planets because they thought that by reading the activities of the gods they could predict the future events on earth.

Today, those ancient Deities are gone, but their moods, emotions and actions are very much present to followers of astrology. The astrologer believes that a person's character and destiny can be revealed by the circular chart known as the horoscope. The chart depicts the Earth at its center, surrounded by the twelve Zodiacal constellations. The position of the Zodiac signs at the time of a person's birth and the general positions of the planets at that instant are the determining factors of a someone's personality, according to astrologers.

Assistant Professor of Physics, David Lien suggested that astrology is nothing more than a pseudo-science. Any scientific research done on the validity of astrology, using controls and systematic testing, "has come up negative," Lien said.

Lien added that the belief in astrology is quite a different story. Referring to the notorious circus entertainer P.T. Barnum, Lien said that people have what is called the "Barnum Effect," and believe what they want to believe. "Life is full of stress and uncertainty, so people search for some rock to hold onto in this sea of uncertainty," Lien said. "If the rock is positive, and astrology for the most part is, people hold onto it."

As for the "healthiness" in believing astrology, Lien indicated that it was "psychologically healthy" because talking to an astrologer allows a person to sort through and talk about their problems. The astrologist, in turn, is generally positive, and provides optimistic support for the person. "Astrologers are also cheaper than psychiatrists," added Lien.

Problems with astrology arise when the "predictions" are portrayed as real, Lien said. "It is incorrect, untrue and misleading," Lien said. "You can't pass off astrology as a science."

Though there are hard-core believers in the validity of horoscopes and astrology, Bucknellians seem to treat the mystical prophecies as an entertaining and sometimes coincidental phenomenon. Tom Kuhn '94 took a more practical view of astrological possibilities, and said, "I'm an engineer, so I try to explain everything scientifically. Horoscopes are just too generalized. They apply to anyone if you look close enough."

Andrea Fleming '95 noted that following her horoscopes is a harmless practice. "I always read my horoscopes," Fleming said. "I don't think they are always true, but you never know. It's all in fun."

Dan Howard '93 extended his limited beliefs in astrology to knowing his zodiac sign. "I only know my sign because bouncers sometimes ask you your sign before they let you in," Howard said.

A sincere skeptic, Dave Walsh '95 said, "I don't believe in any of it (astrology). People believe in it to soothe their fears of the unknown."

Crystals

Did you know that the fad in the past few years of wearing crystals originated in Ancient Egypt during the Middle Ages? They were thought to possess magical powers and were believed to be protective devices against disease and evil spirits. The stone was commonly worn on a string around the neck so that it could be seen.

During this period, crystal amulets were also used for curing sicknesses. The sparkling objects were thought to possess great healing powers.

It is also believed that the colors of crystals have certain symbolic meanings. Pink is associated with love, green with earthiness, purple with passion, white or clear with purity and black with evil.

Today, crystals are still worn by many people, though they are usually worn for decoration and not for mystical reasons. However, some people today still believe that they bring good luck. One student said that soaking her crystal in salt water every week energizes the crystal and brings her good luck.

Crystal balls are also said to have a mystical power that allows one to catch a glimpse of the future. In order to find what the future holds, the fortune-teller gazes intensely into the crystal (or mirror, or pool of ink). If the contact with the crystal is clear, the revelation will appear either in the form of words or in a picture.

Crystal gazing is often associated with gypsies and traveling circus side-shows, but the artform has been practiced in almost every country and culture, including Persia, Australia, Mexico, Siberia and Samoa.

Because wearing crystals is a fad, it is not unusual to see students adorned with rings, bracelets, earrings and other accessories made of crystal. For the most part, however, the interest in the mystical undertones of crystals have been replaced by the desire for fashion.

Katie Debonville '95, though a skeptic, noted her willingness to believe in the almighty powers of the crystal. "If the powers are true, and they work, great! I need all the help I can get. If not, they still look good," said Debonville.

Unwilling to dismiss the capabilities of the crystal, Zoe Moutsos '95 said, "I don't think my crystal has the power to heal because I bought mine at a store. I do think that some other crystals have power, though."

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

The mysteries of the "power crystal" have been replaced by the need to accesorize. Are you a believer or fashion statement?

Tarot cards

Have you ever had that sneaky desire to have someone tell your fortune with a deck of cards? Or does the prospect of being dealt a 'death' card scare you into rejection of the practice? Whatever your desires or beliefs hold, reading Tarot cards is still a popular method of peeking into the future.

Though modern playing cards have a short history, dating back only 500 years, "divination" cards are epic and go back to ancient Egypt and China. The "cards" were made of copper, silver or gold and were engraved with various symbols and numbers. The similarity in styles between these early plates and Tarot cards indicate that they may have prompted the introduction of the tarot practice.

The tarot pack consists of 78 cards, which can be separated into two smaller packs. The first pack resembles an ordinary deck of cards; it holds 56 cards and four suits (Rods, Cups, Swords and Money) that are designated in terms of numbers. Each suit has a hidden theme for fortune-telling purposes. For example, Rods mean enterprise, creation and work; Cups, love and happiness; Swords, hatred and war; and Money, cash and business. The second pack is made up of 22 cards called "atouts," and are decorated with symbolic pictures, representing compelling ideas such as strength or death.

Some diviners of the tarot cards claim that the order of the cards, and the pattern into which they are dealt are determined by mere chance. Others claim that the pattern of the cards is determined solely by the spirits. Whether the spirits are good or evil rests upon the character of the person who is putting the question to the Tarot and the person who is dealing the cards.

There are believers and there are non-believers in all of the pseudo-sciences. Valerie K. Marsden '93 would like to have a reading from tarot cards done on her, but she said a strict Christian upbringing prevents any strong faith or belief in the results. "I'd like to do it, but I'm scared to believe it actually works," Marsden said.

Kim Domanski '94 has had her cards read on several occasions. Although she is hesitant to fully believe in the tell-tale cards, Domanski said that some of the readings were, "shockingly accurate." Other times, Domanski noted that the cards were too vague and one could apply the readings to anyone. "I still get it done, though," Domanski said.

Another spooked semi-believer, Peter Tripp '93 said that fortune-telling was a dangerous flirtation with fate. "I'm scared of all of that stuff," Tripp said. "I believe that there is something else going on that we don't know about. I just don't think people should predict the future because it's going to happen anyway and we're better off not knowing." What do you think?

Palm Reading

How long will I live? How smart will I be? Will I fall in love? If you've ever asked yourself these questions and hoped that one day you would know, if you are suspicious and superstitious, look no further than the palm of your hand for all the answers.

Palm reading, or palmistry, is an old artform that has survived the days of witch persecution and the age of reason. Under English law, practicing palmistry for a fee was illegal because it was a "pretended art."

In spite of the difficulties, palm reading managed to transcend the centuries and remains one of the most popular "witching" arts. Its popularity and believability is due in part to the fact that every hand has unique shape, formation of creases and size. The continuing practice of palm reading is also attributable to the insatiable human curiosity about what the future holds.

A fortune-tellers guide to palmistry from Jean Belot's Oeuvres.

The roots of palmistry date back to the ancient Greek, Roman and Chinese civilizations. For centuries, the tradition of palm reading has lingered among traveling gypsies and fortune-tellers.

Though palm reading is usually associated with just reading fortunes from the lines of the hand, there are actually two types of palmistry. The first type, cheirognomy, is reading the personality and traits of a person by examining the shape of the fingers, nails and hands. Palm readers examine these characteristics and draw conclusions as to the person's personality. For example, square palms indicate a practical, well-balanced individual, while long and thin palms are the sign of a studious, philosophic, and spiritual person.

The second type of palmistry, cheiromancy, is reading the lines on a hand. Palm readers examine the length, strength, wholeness and curves of the creases in a person's hand to determine various fortune-oriented details. The main lines are the creases found running left to right on the hand at the root of the fingers. The upper line is the heart line, the middle line is the head line, and the line running from the area between the forefinger and thumb toward the wrist is the lifeline. The characteristics of these lines determine the person's emotional, intellectual and life-extending capacities respectively.

Some will argue that the art of palm reading, as with any other pseudo-science, is an improbable hoax. Still others insist that the uniqueness and variety of hands clearly indicates an eerie connection to fortune and personality. Whatever the belief, the debate has survived time and will continue until the truth, if there is any, is found.

Titilating Tidbit

Fourteen years before the Titanic sailed on an April day in 1912 on her maiden voyage from Southhampton to New York, a novel was published called Futility about an unsinkable and glamourous Atlantic liner, the largest in the world. Like the Titanic, the fictional vessel was triple-screw and could make 24-25 knots; at 800 feet it was a little shorter than the Titanic, but at 70,000 tons, its displacement was 4,000 tons greater. On a cold April night, the fictional "unsinkable" vessel strikes an iceberg and glides to the bottom of the Atlantic. The name of this liner, in the story by Morgan Robertson—The Titan. —Isaac Asimov's Book of Facts

Zodiac Signs

Characteristics of the sign and famous people born under the sign

Aries– irritable, aggressive; Van Gogh
Taurus– practical; Sigmund Freud, George Washington
Gemini– of lively intellect, creative; John F. Kennedy
Cancer– tenacious; Lord Byron, Frederick Wolfe
Leo–resolute, outgoing; Mussolini, Dumas Pere (Three Musketeers)
Virgo– studious, aloof; Tolstoy, Lyndon B. Johnson
Libra– good-tempered, amiable; Erasmus, Ghandi
Scorpio– vigorous, sexy; Napolean Bonaparte, Edith Piaf

Peterec and students take on the world

The education which comes from classes or textbooks is undeniably valuable. But when you consider just how many hours are spent outside of the classroom in pursuit of other avenues of learning, one realizes that it is these real-world experiences which enhance any education, rather than the time spent in a lecture hall.

Endeavors such as these form the basis for semesters spent traveling abroad. Immersing oneself in the history, politics and culture of a new country provides an insight that can never be provided through simple classroom discussion.

Enter Richard Peterec, professor of geography. For the past 20 years he has traveled with students to countries in the Middle East, Africa and Eastern Europe during January or the summer months. "Just like a chemist's laboratory, the world is our laboratory," commented Peterec. "Seeing places firsthand is so much better than simply talking about them."

Professor of Geography Richard Peterec offers students a view of the world that no class could possibly teach.

This past summer, Professor Peterec's group of about 20 Bucknell students traveled through Europe from June 1 to July 10, visiting the countries influenced by the once powerful Ottoman Empire, as well as several countries in Eastern Europe. While driving through a country, Professor Peterec gave lectures about the area's geography, culture and history. The first half of the course was about the Turkish Ottoman Empire and the second half covered the political geography of Eastern Europe. Five or six quizzes were administered, and all students enrolled on the trip received two summer school credits.

"Professor Peterec was incredible. He knew everything!" exclaimed one of the students on the trip, Scott Alfieri '94. "When we got to the Ottoman Empire, Professor Peterec kept mentioning the 'bouncing ball of power.' Eventually that ball had jumped to the Ottoman Empire, and across the heart of Europe you can see the remnants of its stronghold." Added Peterec, "At one point or another, every empire gains an incredible amount of power and is paramount to all other countries at that point in time. Right now that power is in the U.S., but I have a feeling that it's on its way out—perhaps to China."

Peterec continued, "In addition to just learning about the culture, these trips promote a sense of friendship between the students. I feel that bonds are created between the students themselves as well as between the students and myself." Alfieri noted, "After spending five or six weeks with the group you realize that communication with everyone is very important. And because we all had to share the responsibilities of driving, packing and unloading, cooperation was necessary."

The Blue Mosque in Istanbul, Turkey was just one of the historic sights along Professor Peterec's tour across Europe.

Another traveller, Scott Dietrich, commented, "The trip was very enjoyable and it was so interesting just to get some knowledge of these countries, both politically and geographically. I liked Prague in particular. It seemed like a museum because it has never been destroyed by a war."

Peterec is planning another trip this summer to the Middle East to tour Egypt, Israel, Palestine and Jordan. The cost will be under or around $2,000, which includes air fare, transportation expenses while there, and living arrangements. The cost does not, however, include the tuition one must pay to the university—those who wish to travel with the group must be enrolled in the Bucknell summer program.

Greenhouse boasts the exotic

ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In less than one hour you can experience everything from the desert to the rainforest, beautiful tropical flowers to spiny cacti, and even carnivorous plants. Where can one possibly find all of these diverse environments under a single roof? Bucknell's own biology greenhouse.

Open for scarcely one year, the greenhouse is stocked with hundreds of different varieties of plant life. The tour begins with the desert climate, and progresses to the more humid, water-rich environments.

Biology professor Warren Abrahamson pointed out many interesting facts about the plants that the average person would not know. For example, some of the plants in the desert environment that look like cacti were, in fact, part of the poinsettia family, but had evolved throughout the years to bear a striking resemblance to the true cacti. Also on display is the Boojum tree, a plant that looks like a rock that has sprouted leaves. There is also a South African plant called Living Stones, which ironically looks like the picture the name suggests.

Moving on with the tour, one will arrive at the carnivorous plants section. Growing in a makeshift bog, their natural habitat, are such varieties as the popular Venus Fly Trap and the Purple Pitcher plant. The plants were forced to become carnivorous because the bog environment is very low in essential nutrients, such as nitrogen, that are necessary for the plants' survival.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

The Birds Nest Fern is just one of the many exotic plants that can be found in the biology department's greenhouse.

Aquatic plants, such as the water hyacinth, grow in a man-made pond filled with fish. The hyacinth has evolved through the years to become buoyant, thereby ensuring its survival in the aquatic environment.

An entire section of the greenhouse is devoted to pineapple plants. Most might wonder what could possibly be interesting about a bunch of pineapples, but the pineapples in the greenhouse are sure to fascinate. Nowhere else will you be able to find plants that are this colorful, with vibrant pinks, purples, and yellows bursting from the green foliage.

Another section is known as the "economic plants" section. This section includes plants such as bananas, olives, papayas, coffee, carob, and avocado—plants that are important to the economies of many nations.

Perhaps one of the most interesting specimens available is the cycad. Professor Abrahamson said that cycads have been slowly declining in number "over the past 60 million years," which dates back to the age of the dinosaurs. Thin, green leathery leaves protrude in a fan-like array similar to palm leaves. Abrahamson said that the cycad family is now being replaced in world ecosystems by ferns and flowering plants.

Heather Jobson—The Bucknellian

Someone's bad hair day or the Purple Pitcher Plant?

The collection of plants was originally started by Wayne Wanning, professor emeritus, who found an empty greenhouse waiting to be filled many years ago. Since then, the collection has grown and changed. "We have tried to add as much as possible," said Abrahamson. "The plants are from all over the world, not simply North America."

The biology department hosts tours for the area school districts who want to learn more about plant life. "There isn't any other place around that offers this unless you are willing to go to the Philadelphia or Pittsburgh areas," said Abrahamson.

The greenhouse is open most mornings after 9 a.m. for students interesting in browsing through the collection by themselves. The biology department is also offering a January Plan for students desiring to do more than look at plants. Guided tours of the greenhouse are usually conducted during major campus weekends such as Homecoming, Parents' Weekend and Spring Weekend.

Polish up on your skating skills

Swish, swish, swish, the gusty wafts of air blow through you and the faint beat of the music dances around in your head. Despite the sounds, this is not a description of some random dream. Rather, it is the nostalgic sensation of roller skating.

If you have transportation, a sense of adventure and are not easily embarrassed, relive the early 80's and go roller-skating. A mere 15 minute drive up Route 15, the Sunset Rink is an escape from campus and Lewisburg, and provides a night of guaranteed entertainment.

The Sunset Rink, under the management of Mary and Robert Furst, opened 12 years ago. The rink caters to the young as well as the young at heart, featuring country and Top 40 music for adults 21 and over on Monday and Tuesday nights, and sock hops for all ages on Saturday nights.

For $4 (with skate rental, $3.25 without), one can skate for as long as three hours and partake in the art of skating backwards or falling down, whatever the case may be. Aside from being left in the dust by pre-pubescent speed demons, if you haven't been skating since grade school, the roll down memory lane can be an inviting and hilarious way to waste an evening.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Who said there is nothing to do around here on weekends? The Sunset Rink on Route 15 offers a night packed with entertainment.

And if skating in a circle for hours just isn't thrilling enough, the rink also offers several of those memorable skate games, such as Freeze Frame (stopping mid-skate and not moving until the music starts again) and Turtle or Speed races.

After a few hours of skating, a weary body is welcome to take advantage of the other alternatives offered by the rink. With a host of the latest video games, a pool table and a fully stocked refreshment stand, one would be hard pressed to find a more well-rounded evening of entertainment.

Men's X-country wins 18th straight title

Bison men put an end to war of the words with Lehigh; women run competitively and take third in Patriot League Championships

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This past Saturday in New York's Van Cortlandt Park, the men's cross country team silenced all comers in taking first in the Patriot League Championships, while the Lady Bison placed an impressive third behind Lehigh and Fordham.

For the men, this was supposed to be "The year in which Bucknell's cross country dynasty ended and Lehigh's began," according to brassy Engineer coach Fred LaPlante. Not only did the Bison win their 18th consecutive conference title (15 of them in the East Coast Conference), but they showed the rest of the East that their definition of a "rebuilding year" is radically different from that of other programs.

Bucknell's 30 points weren't challenged by the boys from Bethlehem and their meager 51. Colgate, Lafayette, Holy Cross, and Fordham were literally "also rans."

Nevertheless, Colgate's main man, Ray Appenheimer, dominated the field in winning by almost a minute.

Tri-captain Tom Eagleson '93 was the first Bison to cross the finish line and the third runner to do so overall. His time of 25:24 was identical to the second-place time, but it was ruled that he did indeed cross the line third. Fellow tri-captains Judd Jarden '93 and John Lewis '93 were the next two Bison to finish the course. Like Eagleson, Jarden's time was identical to his preceder's, but he also lost a photo finish.

Head coach Art Gulden cited several factors that were responsible for the victory. "We ran a pretty good race and reacted well to the challenge of having conference runners alongside of us," said Gulden. "We ran tough and held our poise."

Gulden was also quick to credit the Engineers for challenging his team.

"This year's times were better than last year's because we were actually pushed. Lehigh ran an intelligent race and covered all of our moves."

One move that the team might have regretted occured on the flat section of the course.

"We tried to begin to lose them [Lehigh] on the flats and they covered us. It wasn't until later when, other than their top two runners, the rest of their team dropped off from the pack."

Bucknell placed six runners ahead of Lehigh's third finisher to close out the meet. Each team's first five finishers make up the team score.

Chris Preistaf '95 placed seventh overall with a time of 25:44, and Jim Farrer '93 ninth at 25:53. By placing five men in the top ten, Bucknell in effect blew away the rest of the league.

Soladia Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Cross country head coach Art Gulden stands with men's team tri-captains John Lewis '93, Tom Eagleson '93, and Judd Jarden '93, who helped lead the team to its eighteenth-straight league crown on Saturday.

The season is far from over for the Bison, though. A week from tomorrow, they will compete at the IC4A championships in lovely Bethlehem, PA—home of the Lehigh Engineers. The top three teams from this regional competition receive automatic bids to the national championships.

Gulden believes that the team has a serious shot at returning to nationals. Pre-season favorites Villanova, Georgetown, Iona, and Penn State (like its football team) have all been fading recently, while Navy and Bucknell are on the rise. In fact, Gulden said, "We have yet to run our optimal race." He went on to say that it will take everyone's best performance to carry the team to nationals.

Even if the Bison don't finish in the top three, they do stand a strong chance at receiving an at-large bid since they've beaten Northern Arizona, Baylor, and UConn, who are nationally ranked.

"We just have to do it. It's a longer course (10K instead of five) and that benefits us because we train for strength."

Bucknell's women's cross country program, meanwhile, made tremendous strides last weekend at Van Cortlandt Park.

Last fall the Bison weren't even competitive in the championships, finishing fifth out of six. This year, however, they finished third with 69 points, behind the Lady Engineers of Lehigh (39) and the Lady Rams of Fordham (49). Holy Cross (75) finished a close fourth behind the Bison, while Lafayette and Colgate pretty much wasted funds by making the trip since they each racked up over 145 points and failed to place a single

Impotent Bucknell gridiron squad amasses a mere 98 yards of total offense; QB Peter Harteveld '96 to be tested again against Lehigh

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Going into last Saturday's matchup with previously winless Fordham, no one knew for sure how the broken ankle of Travis Kopp '95 would affect the Bucknell football team. Well, after the Bison's embarrassing 21-0 loss to the Rams, we now know.

Susan Naughton—The Bucknellian

Fullback Joe Vargo '93 looks for open space in the Bison's 33-14 homecoming victory over Brown earlier in the season. The much-maligned ground game will look to regain its early season form tomorrow against Lehigh in Bethlehem, Pa.

Fordham, who snapped a 12-game losing skid dating back to last year, held the Bison (3-5) to just 98 total yards of offense—their lowest total since a 17-10 loss to Holy Cross in 1986. When you consider that 40 of those yards came on one pass to Brad Bernardini '94, it is obvious that the Bison were simply dominated.

Kopp, who suffered his injury early in the first quarter of the 27-12 loss to Holy Cross on Oct. 24, could only watch from the sidelines as two Bucknell quarterbacks made futile attempts to lead the offense. Freshman Pete Harteveld made his first collegiate start and, befitting of the gloomy Halloween afternoon, the debut quickly dissolved into a nightmare.

On the day, Harteveld completed just three of 19 passes and was intercepted three times. Rob Glus '95, who had battled Kopp for a starting spot in the preseason, also saw action, but he was equally ineffective. The sophomore was on target on just two of five passes, and he was also picked off once.

Head coach Lou Maranzana's decision to start Harteveld was somewhat controversial, and looks especially questionable after the results of this weekend's game. Glus has more experience, having had played in five games this year and actually making a start last year against Cornell. Harteveld, on the other hand, had just made his collegiate debut in taking over after Kopp's injury in the game against the Crusaders. Despite the fact that he fared fairly well in that game, completing 11 of 22 passes and leading three long drives, he has considerably less seasoning than Glus.

Of course, all of this would have been moot had the running game been anything short of pitiful.

The Bison were only able to muster 35 net yards on the ground on 32 carries. Matt Walsh '93, who has had a very successful season, was held to a meager eight yards on 12 carries.

The team's success has seemed to center around Walsh this season. In games in which Walsh has rushed for more than 100 yards, Bucknell is 3-0, but in all other games, it is 0-5. Walsh has averaged only about 30 yards per game in the five losses.

One of the main reasons for the poor rushing effort was Fordham middle linebacker Mark Blazejewski. Bucknell has achieved most of its rushing success between the tackles this year, but the intimidation stemming from Blazejewski's presence on the field forced the ground game to the outside on Saturday. Walsh and Kevin McElvene '93 are powerful runners, but they do not have the speed to beat people to the outside.

Bucknell's defense, on the other hand, did an admirable job, considering Fordham (1-7) had excellent field position all day long. The Bison held the visitors from New York to just 217 total yards, and three times they held the Rams scoreless after they had started drives inside the Bucknell 25-yard line.

Running back Kevin McElvene '93 eludes would-be tacklers in the team's disappointing loss to the Fordham Rams last weekend at Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium.

Fordham's three touchdowns all came on the ground. In the first half, Ram Chris Ross twice scored from one yard out, while Scott Helverson marched in from 18 yards away to put the game out of reach.

Men's soccer completes season

Bison battle to tie with playoff-bound Navy; fall to Drexel to wrap up 1992 campaign

BY MIKE MELESKY AND NEIL BARDACH
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Midfielder Jon MacKenzie '93 evades a slide tackle at home earlier this season. The senior made his twentieth career assist during Bucknell's 2-2 tie with Navy last Saturday, and is third in assists on the men's soccer all-time leader list.

The men's soccer team ended its 1992 campaign this week with an impressive tie against Navy and a loss on the road against Drexel. The defeat at the hands of the Dragons was especially disappointing since it denied the Bison (7-9-1) a .500 record for the year.

Last Saturday Bucknell played like men possessed and managed to tie heavily-favored Navy (10-5-1) in overtime, 2-2. After digging itself into an early 2-0 deficit, the Orange and Blue came back to even up the game and force it into the extra period.

The Bison looked weak early, allowing a goal only ninety seconds into the match. The defense came out slowly, and a Navy forward took full advantage of the disarray, putting a booming header past a helpless Mark Wrigley '94, who had no support in the field. Immediately after the goal, the team huddled together for a conference inside its penalty area to iron out the early miscues and, from that point on, it looked determined not to allow the game to become another negative statistic.

"Giving up a goal that soon after the opening kickoff to anyone really tends to create an uphill battle," said midfielder Scott Tardibuono '93, "but we were able to regroup and come back with one of our best halves of the year."

Unfortunately, the Midshipmen continued on with all guns firing, and managed to notch another goal in the first half. Navy took advantage of the slightest of openings in Bucknell's defense, and put the ball into the net for a two-goal advantage at the half when a Middie knocked down a Wrigley goal kick and passed to a teammate who immediately converted.

Despite the second score, the Bison continued to play great defense. Pete Rodano '95, who has proven himself in the last several weeks to be perhaps one of the finest defenders in the league, had one of his strongest showings of the year. As the season has wound down, Rodano has anchored a defense—including Brian Buck '95, Baird McIlvain '95, and Leon Hayduchok '94—that has played with more confidence as of late, and the results have been impressive.

Allowing only a pair of goals to Navy and one to nationally-ranked Penn State last week point strongly to the fact that the defensive corps has truly matured this year, and can be counted on next season to be amongst the best in the league.

In the second 45 minutes Navy seemed content to rest on a seemingly comfortable two-goal cushion, but the Bison would have nothing of it. Bucknell bombarded Navy's goal with shot after shot, and it was only a matter of time before the Bison broke through.

Bucknell did finally show up on the scoreboard, much to the delight of an overwhelmingly partisan crowd of parents and Bucknellians, in the 60th minute. Ed Siddons '93, who had just returned from over two weeks of inactivity with a leg injury, showed that he deserved to regain his starting spot when he played a great ball into a congested penalty box, and Alex Kogan '94 rifled the pass into the net to cut the Navy lead in half.

The goal gave the Bison a new lease on life, and the team continued to barrage the Navy goalkeeper with hard blasts.

For a time it seemed as though Bucknell would not break through any further, as the Navy goaltender almost effortlessly put aside shot after shot. However, after what seemed to be an eternity (in fact only eight minutes later), the Bison equalized in grand style. Bruce MacKenzie '94 lofted the ball over the gambling Navy keeper, who was far out of position, and into the net, and the entire home team went berserk.

It is hard to describe the scene that followed, except to say that there was a portrait of total of elation on the field and also in the stands, where several students went tumbling down from their hillside seats in euphoria. It was probably the best-attended match of the year, with several hundred fans in attendance, and the Bison faithful were well rewarded for their support.

"After the second goal, I really thought that we were going to pull out the victory," said Tardibuono. "From there on Navy fell to pieces, and we simply outplayed them. It's hard to believe that a team headed to the Patriot League tourney could play so poorly."

The goal was also significant for Jon MacKenzie '93, who contributed his twentieth career assist for Bucknell on the play. The senior ended his career in Lewisburg as the third leading assist man in school history.

The Bison played confidently for the rest of the game, feeling as though they could go off into the frosty evening with a victory. Unfortunately, it was not to be for the Orange and Blue, as the Navy defense stood tough until the end of the game, and even overtime could not produce a winner. Nevertheless, the game was definitely the most exciting one the Bison have played in all year, and it was a big plus that they left the field without a loss. Indeed, it was a contest that did not deserve a loser, as both teams played intensely.

With such momentum, the Bison had to feel good going into Drexel to finish the season with a shot at .500. The game was even throughout, with Bucknell outshooting Drexel by two (11-9), and forcing the Drexel keeper to make two more saves than Wrigley. The Bison, however, could not break through Drexel's defense, and dropped the last game of the season by a score of 1-0. The loss left the team with only seven victories for the year, and (along with the Navy tie) denied coach Craig Reynolds of achieving his 200th career victory. He finished this season with an overall record of 198-151-31.

> —Midfielder Scott Tardibuono '93

"I thought we showed nice improvement [during the season]—We just got unlucky and lost a lot of games we should have won," said Buck of this fall. "If we improve and work hard this off-season, we'll have a much better record and a Patriot League tournament berth."

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

The editors would like to express their sincerest apologies to our weekly followers of this column. Due to the untimely death of the fall intramural sports season, we are in a period of mourning. As such, we would deeply appreciate it if our readers would wear all black in reverence and rememberance of the athletes who gave everything that they had—just for the fun of it. However, we will return to you next week regardless of our unstable and sucidial emotional condition with winter sports coverage. Thank you for understanding.

Novice crew teams excel at Occoquan Regatta

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

"Top three, top three, top three!" said some of the novices before their first race this past weekend. "But we've only rowed for a few weeks," worried others. Some even asked, "You don't think we'll lose, do you?"

The first regatta of the season is always traumatic, especially for those novices who have never raced before. In the past, rowers have jumped from boats, coxswains have beached boats during warm-ups, and equipment has failed. But this year, after the waves settled and the rowers were safely back on land, both the novice men's and novice women's "A" boats placed first in their respective races. For the first time in the crew's history, Bucknell men and women swept the novice category at the Head of the Occoquan Regatta in Occoquan, Va.

Tara Connelly '96, Kristina Dupuis '96, Sara Den Besten '96, Maggie Whitman '96, Carrie Rising '96, Jen MacDonald '96, Alyson Weenig '96, Michelle Brophy '96, and coxswain Abbie Sprague '96 defeated tough crews from George Washington University and the Baltimore Rowing Club. Novice men Adam Wright '96, Dan White '96, Dan Tarditi '96, Shaun Streator '96, Mike Marquis '96, Paul Flynn '96, Josh DeWald '96, Victor Arcelus '96, and coxswain Amy Miniflie '96 proved they were no slackers, either, when they rowed over George Mason and Johns Hopkins.

Head coach Jim King said the results were "very encouraging," and attributed much of their success to the two coxswains, saying that "all of the rowers had praise for their excellent performances."

Novice "B" boats also competed in the men's and women's events.

The varsity heavyweight four impressed the competition when they placed fifth out of twenty-nine crews and bested Loyola University, Potomac Masters, and John Hopkins. Comparatively, the heavyweight men placed the highest out of Bucknell's varsity boats, although they did not receive a medal.

The varsity lightweight men's "A" boat placed third out of six crews, defeating George Mason Alumni, Carnegie Mellon, and Bucknell's own varsity lightweight "B" boat for which they later re-

Last weekend Bucknell's water polo team traveled to Princeton to compete in the Mid-Atlantic Championship. The youthful Bison were not necessarily expecting to win the entire tournament, but were instead looking for revenge against an earlier loss to the Midshipmen from Navy, which would give them a bid to the Eastern Championships this coming weekend.

The Bison (10-12) got their opportunity against Navy in the first meeting of the tournament and, like the previous match against the Middies, the game was extremely close throughout. Navy jumped out to an early lead, but Bucknell came back to stay close until its opponents finally pulled away with the match in the fourth quarter, winning 8-6. It was a defensive battle throughout the game, and the Bison's defense was led by goalie Rupert DeVinc '94, who raked up a season-high 17 saves.

"We played really well," said first-year coach John Zeigler '91. "They just wore us down in the fourth quarter." Zeigler was very pleased with his all-around squad play. "I felt it was the best four quarters that the team played all year. It was a strong effort, but a disappointing loss."

The next match of the weekend saw Bucknell squaring off with Iona, a team that the Bison had defeated in Lewisburg several weeks ago.The contest was well-played by both teams, and thanks to a strong effort from the bench, Bucknell prevailed by a score of 8-7. Like the previous match the score was close throughout, and with under a minute to play Iona had gained possession of the ball with score knotted at seven.

DeVinc stopped an Iona shot—one of his twelve saves in the game—and passed ahead to Sean Tierney '95, who had anticipated the turnover, and was already breaking toward the Iona goal. With only four seconds remaining on the clock Tierney fired the game-winning blast past the Iona goaltender, and the Bison came away with the stunning victory.

"This was a solid win for us, with a lot of people contributing. Iona played one of their best games against us, and we did a good job holding them off," said Zeigler of the last-second triumph.

Both Sloan Broderick '96 and team captain Chris Retzler '93 were both ill with the flu and saw limited action, but players off the bench filled in competently and contributed to the win.

The final game of the championship tourney for the Orange and Blue was against Army, who the team had defeated earlier in October by a slim margin of 13-12. Despite the thrilling victory over Iona, though, the Bison were not up for the rematch and came up short against the Cadets, 11-7.

The fourth quarter of the match against Army was the Chris Retzler Show, as he led an attempted comeback by scoring three back-to-back goals. Unfortunately, Retzler's heroics were not enough of what Bucknell needed. "I think that the team realized that Easterns were going to be a long shot after the loss to Navy, and they were a little depressed," said Zeigler of the loss.

The tournament went to Princeton after the Tigers defeated Slippery Rock in sudden-death overtime in the championship match. As for Easterns at Navy, the Bison will be competing in the lower bracket, which means that they will not be able to compete against the top teams in the East.

After bolting out of the blocks with a 3-0 record, the squad has gone a lethargic 7-12 in its last 19 meetings. Zeigler looks at next week's games positively, however, saying that "it will be a good chance for us to end the season with several wins. I'm glad that we will have a chance to play this weekend—this is a team of the future and this will be a good opportunity for us."

The Bison will face both George Washington and Iona (teams that they have defeated already this season) and if they win both of those matches they will be given an opportunity to avenge this past weekend's loss to Army by facing the Cadets in the final game of the 1992 season.

Bundle up—it's the cold and flu season (a.k.a November)

Equestrian team faces Scranton, PSU

BY JONATHAN M. BORDEAU
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Midway through its 1992 fall campaign, the Bucknell equestrian team has continued the consistency of its predecessors.

In two showings against league rivals Scranton and Penn State, Bucknell placed a respectable fourth place out of the nine competing teams.

"This year has been somewhat disappointing because a lot of opportunities have been cancelled," said Jen Walsh '94. "Everyone hasn't been given the opportunity to show their talent."

Walsh echoed the sentiments of many of her teammates. Horse shows are notorious for being subjective in two vital areas: format and the judging. Before a show, the competition draws the name of their mount from a hat. Although this process is the fairest possible, it has its drawbacks. Many times some of the selected mounts are lame or old, thus not having the capabilities of other horses. However, as Walsh stated, "You work with what you can get."

Unfortunately, the judging of shows can also be very suspect. Often there is one judge for a competition of nine schools, each school sending upwards of 25 riders to a show. A good show, says Walsh, is largely dependent on good draws (of mounts) and fair judging.

Bucknell's equestrian team trains at Summer Breeze Stables in nearby Milton. Team members use either stable horses or their own horses for training and home shows. Under the direction of trainer Jan Phillips, the team is required to practice at least once a week, although twice a week is advised. Shows run through the fall, from September to November, and run in the spring from March to April.

Historically, Bucknell riders have fared well in league competition and beyond. Against league foes Wilson College, Penn State, IUP, Pitt, Seton Hill, Keystone Junior College, West Virginia University, Scranton, and Potomac, the Bison have consistently placed in the top five. At the end of the regular season, if a rider has amassed enough points, she can qualify for the regionals, then go on to the zones, then possibly the nationals. Last season, former captain Kelly Kordish '92 qualified for the national competition.

Twenty-five members of the team total of forty will travel to Seton Hill this Sunday. There, stricter parameters for qualification to the regionals, zones, and nationals will make competition tough. Bucknell hopes to fare better than league rivals Penn State and Wilson, although team member Katie Kowalski '93 is reluctant in predicting how Bucknell will perform at Seton Hill.

"A lot depends on whether you draw a good mount or a bad mount," said Kowalski. "From there it depends on the judging."

Bison hold off Fork Union charge, 27-26

BY ROSS FEINGOLD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

In its final game of the 1992 season, the Bison JV football team was able to hold off a late fourth-quarter rally and defeat visiting Fork Union, 27-26. As usual, the squad needed contributions from numerous players on both sides of the ball in order to pull out the win amidst muddy conditions and rainy skies this past Monday.

Bucknell (3-2) was able to jump out to a commanding lead due in large part to the contributions of running back Darren Bloch '96, who rushed 18 times for 53 yards and scored two touchdowns.

"Darren Bloch had a great game," said offensive tackle Francisco Garcia '96, who helped to open some holes for the tailback. Ken McClain '94 had the day's highlight, though, when he scampered 51 yards to set up another Bison touchdown.

After a mediocre performance against the Lafayette Leopards last week, quarterback Andy Amrhein '94 had a solid game against Fork Union. The junior went 10-15 for 130 yards without throwing any interceptions, and his passes helped to move the JV downfield quickly to set up several rushing touchdowns.

Amrhein and Mike Phillips '96 hooked up for three catches for 71 yards, including one 31-yard play in the third quarter. On fourth down, the Bison sent out four wide receivers and Amrhein was able to find Phillips in the middle of the field for the sliding catch.

"It was tough losing Peter Harteveld to the varsity, but Andy did a great job," said Phillips.

With the help of a fumble recovery in the end zone by Ed Burman '96, the Bison built up a 27-6 lead going into the final quarter.

Similar to many other divisious quarters for the JV this season, however, the defense began to unravel in the fourth period of play. Linebacker Andy Doremus '96 explained that Bucknell "gave them [Fork Union] good field position and they ran some passing plays and we began to get flustered, but in the end we held tough."

Added linebacker Len Grecek '96, who had seven solo tackles, "We shouldn't have been in that situation, but we were able to hold them off."

The Bison gave up three unanswered touchdowns in the fourth quarter, but with Fork Union going for two points and the win after its last touchdown with two minutes to play, David Todd '95 was able to pick off the pass and seal the narrow win.

"We came out content in the second half and gave up some points but we were able to stop them," said defensive end Chad Zaring '96.

The JV squad finished its season at 3-2, but this fall's record could have easily been 4-1 if not for the one-point heartbreaker to the Leopards last week.

"We enjoyed our season a lot, although it could have been longer," said Grecek. "The Lafayette loss hurt."

Added Brien Davis '96, "We should be 4-1 but due to the fact that we screwed up a lot of opportunities we are only 3-2, but we will be a good team next year."

The JV team seems to have brought together players with true promise, but it is necessary that they receive proper coaching in order to move their quality of play to a higher level. Sloppy execution on the field was a problem all season long, and it almost cost them a victory against Fork Union on Monday as it did against Lafayette. However, there could be hope for the future of Bison football if the current crop of JV players can realize its full potential.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Pete Gorski '96 darts out of the path of a host of Lafayette defenders in a 27-26 defeat last week. The Bison turned the tables on Fork Union Military Academy by beating it by the same score on Monday.

Tom Eagleson '93

Men's cross country team tri-captain Tom Eagleson '93 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of November 6 for his team-best performance in the Patriot League Championships at Van Cortlandt Park, NY last Saturday.

The senior runner led the Bison team to its 18th-straight league title by being the first Bucknell entrant to cross the finish line. He garnered a third-place finish for the day with a time of 25:24, and has consistently led the 1992 team to victory during its 6-0 season.

Eagleson hails from Potomac, Maryland and is pursuing a degree in business administration.

Lady Spikers gain valuable league win

Volleyball team sweeps Holy Cross, earns higher seed in Patriot League Tournament

BY ERIC BIRNBAUM
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Friday, Bucknell's women's volleyball team played its final regular-season league games against rivals Holy Cross and Army in Annapolis.

The Lady Spikers (4-20) began their day of competition by looking to improve on their 1-4 league record against the Crusaders of Holy Cross, who had only won three matches coming into the meeting. In the first game the Orange and Blue came out in impressive fashion and crushed the opposition, 15-1. In the following game Holy Cross fought back with heightened intensity, but Bucknell stayed focused and held on to win, 15-12. The Lady Spikers, only needing one more game to close out the match, continued their high level of play in the third stanza and won the final game handily, 15-5.

"We played together as a team. We put them [Holy Cross] on the defensive," said co-captain Aubrey Schneggenburger '95. "We played balanced volleyball—It was a team effort."

Bucknell's dominating attack against Holy Cross was led by Schneggenburger with seven kills, Katie Steele '96 with six kills, and Heather Hoehn '94 with five kills. In all, the Bison garnered a respectable total of 25 kills throughout the 3-0 triumph.

Bucknell, looking to put together consecutive wins, then went up against a difficult challenge as it faced the intimidating Patriot League leaders from Army. The Cadets (19-9, 7-0) had no sympathy for the visitors' cause, though, and dismissed Bucknell quickly and convincingly, 15-5, 15-4 and 15-11.

Bucknell collected a mere 18 kills throughout the match and put together a horrendous 11% hitting accuracy versus the Black Knights, who were in control from start to finish.

"I definitely feel that Army is the strongest team in the league. However, I do feel that they are beatable," said co-captain Sarah Mesaros '93. "If we showed the intensity and desire we are capable of producing, we could have reached that superior level and played with them."

The loss to Army ended Bucknell's regular season league play and doomed the team to a sixth-place finish in the Patriot League. However, with their straight-set victory over the Crusaders, the Lady Spikers moved past Fordham in the standings and will now face Colgate (4-3 in league play) instead of powerhouse Navy (6-1) at the league tourney next week. Clearly, the team's fourth win could not have come at a more crucial time, as it served to make its first tournament draw that much more agreeable.

Tomorrow, the Orange and Blue will compete on the road in its two remaining non-league matches against teams from Columbia and Vermont. Then, on Nov. 14-15 at Holy Cross, Bucknell will face off against the third-seeded Red Raiders and hope for an upset in the Patriot League Tournament. Earlier this season in October, Colgate dealt the Bison a 3-1 loss at Fordham.

runner in the top 12.

If not for a cautious start, Bucknell might have placed even higher. "We ran as well as anyone the last two miles, but we got ourselves in too big a hole after the first mile," Gulden explained later.

At the beginning of the race Fordham and Holy Cross went out very hard with Lehigh right on their heels, and the Bison were caught by surprise and spent the rest of the meet playing catch-up.

"Sometimes you can make teams pay for going out like that in a five-mile race, but not in a 5K. It's just too short a race," said Gulden.

He went on to praise the efforts of his team, saying, "This year's team is much, much better than last year's and they're getting better. We were extremely competitive this year."

To nobody's surprise, captain Kristin Opdyke '93 was Bucknell's top finisher, taking third place overall. Fordham's "bionic woman" Lauren Gubicza breezed by the rest of the field and won the three-mile race by over a minute at 17:26. Kathy Wurster '94 placed 11th overall and second for the Bison, while Maria Ryan '96, Jessica Wilhelm '95, and Becky Tobin '95 completed Bucknell's scoring by taking 15th, 19th, and 21st, respectively.

The women will also toss their hats into the post-season ring a week from tomorrow when they compete in the district championships. In years past the team has only sent a limited amount of runners to compete in the University division race. This year, however, Gulden believes that the whole team is ready for the championship race.

"It's probably unrealistic to think that we'll advance, but if we remain healthy we'll be competitive," said an anxious Gulden.

had his best game of the year, contributing sixteen tackles, one quarterback sack, and a blocked field goal. In addition, Strohecker has pulled to within one tackle of fellow linebacker Dan Zappa '94 for the team lead. Zappa has 76, while Strohecker has 75. Zappa is questionable for tomorrow's game at Lehigh after aggravating a neck injury against Fordham.

Tomorrow's match-up against the Lehigh Engineers in Bethlehem has an outside chance of putting the Orange and Blue back on course.

After finishing last year with a 9-2 record, Lehigh has limped to a 2-6 mark this season. The Engineers lost most of their better players from last year to graduation, and their top offensive performer, tailback Mark Lookenbill (333 rushing yards in three games), is out for the season with a knee injury.

Bucknell will again have to contend with a strong quarterback/receiver duo. Scott Semptimphelter has thrown for more than 2,300 yards and 12 touchdowns this year, while wideout Jason Cristino has caught 50 passes for 935 yards and six touchdowns.

Last week's hyped receiver matchup turned out to be a bust. Bucknell's Whitey Berardinelli '93 and Fordham's Tom Garlick had combined to catch 79 passes this year but, typical of the day's lack of offensive productivity, neither of them caught a ball. For Berardinelli, it was the first time in his 18 career starts that he failed to make a reception. In order for him to outduel Cristino tomorrow, Harteveld will have to receive much better protection from his offensive line and improve his accuracy considerably.

One change in the lineup tomorrow may or may not prove to be significant. Erik Klingner '94, normally a wide receiver, will take over the placekicking duties.

Klingner, who actually would have been the kicker against Fordham but never got a chance to perform, will take over for the ineffective Justin Frick '94 and Erik Hacker '95. The junior kicked impressively in high school, converting on all 41 of his extra-point attempts and making a career-best 39-yard field goal.

Lehigh holds a narrow 27-25-3 lead in the all-time series, including a 41-13 win over the Bison last year in Lewisburg.

ceived a third-place medal. The varsity women's eight faced formidable competition and tough race conditions, finishing a disappointing sixth in their race.

Although only the novice crews were able to surpass the day's overall mediocrity, the team is looking forward to the Frostbite Invitational Regatta on Nov. 14. There they will compete with many of Philadelphia's finest crews on the Schuylkill River.

Surprise!—Everybody wins

Call it the Gulden Amendment. Or the Eleventh-Hour Reprieve. Or the Championship Change. Regardless of how it will be remembered in the coming years, the recent revision of the proposed academic calendar to accommodate spring sports schedules is a compromise that both faculty and students should be proud of.

Just when you thought that the little man couldn't be heard at Bucknell, along comes Art Gulden. At this past Monday's faculty meeting, the coach of the men's and women's cross country teams took it on himself to change the faculty's mind about the former calendar system, which denied some athletes the chance to compete in their sports' championships since they occurred during the University's proposed spring exam week.

Not that I'm calling Gulden a little man, mind you. Much to the contrary, he came up huge when it counted.

But Gulden wasn't alone by any means. The revision wouldn't have had a chance to survive if many members of the faculty not taken the time to think about our student-athletes, and the disappointment that would have befallen them had the proposed schedule been implemented. It would have been easier to go on as if there were nothing wrong with the revised calendar, but, in the final analysis, student concerns were rightfully taken into account.

As a final note regarding the faculty, thank heaven it didn't knuckle under to that "frame-of-reference" garbage that a few weeks ago seemed to be all that the University cared about. These are our students, our concerns, and our future—not Colgate's or Lafayette's—and our professors realized this important fact.

When I was a child, my mother once told me, "Peter, don't worry about what everyone else is doing—just worry about what you're doing." I'm not quite certain how much that applies to the point I'm making, but I'll throw it in just in case I forget Mother's Day this coming year.

Last, we should not forget the voices of the student body, which were heard from loud and clear after word of the original calendar revisions came out. These Bucknellians did not abandon ship even when it seemed as if the new schedule was irrevocably set, and their tenacity in fighting for what they saw as a just cause is commendable.

It was almost satisfying to see so many students that teed off, simply because it was the furthest thing from apathy that I've seen in four years on this campus. Sometimes an issue has to hit you where you live, I suppose, before people start to kick and scream.

As it stands now, the academic calendar will extend into the first week of May, and our athletes will thus be able to participate in the championships that are expected to transpire at that time. Conversely, the faculty members also come out of the settlement with significant satisfaction, so the best of both worlds was, for once, achieved beyond a reasonable doubt for both students and professors.

Women's soccer loses in playoffs to Army

Underdog Lady Bison fall to Black Knights, 5-0; Gibbons '95 and Gordiano '95 earn all-league honors

Midfielder/forward Kara Patrick '96 looks to set up an offensive attack as Bucknell's bench watches the action. The women's soccer team fell to the Cadets 5-0 in the Patriot League Championship semi-finals last Saturday at West Point.

Bucknellian Staff Writers

On Halloween last Saturday, Bucknell's women's soccer team was shut down by a frighteningly overwhelming team from Army in the Patriot League semifinal playoffs, 5-0.

The Bison (6-12-1), who barely edged out Lehigh and Holy Cross for the fourth and final playoff spot in this fall's post-season play, were dominated throughout by the number-one seed Cadets.

Coming off a 3-0 win last Thursday night against St. Francis, the team was obviously primed to travel to West Point to take on a very highly skilled, heavily conditioned Army squad. However, matters quickly turned sour after Black Knights Andrea French and Alexis Albano put in a goal each to give the home team a 2-0 halftime advantage.

In the second half of play, two scores by Selina DeViney and one by Mary Ashworth gave Army its final margin of victory, while Bucknell continued to be befuddled by the Cadet defense.

Bison goalminder Kim Fekel '93 stopped only half of all shots that came her way, saving five, while Army goalie Annah Castellini intercepted all four Bucknell attempts on the net.

It is often said that statistics can be misleading but, unfortunately for the Lady Bison, such was not the case in this game. The Cadets owned the Orange and Blue in both corner kicks (5-1) and shots on goal (14-4), and generally controlled the tempo of the match from the moment that cleat first touched ball.

After the victory, Army (16-4-1) proceeded to the Patriot League finals and eventually was upset 3-1 by Colgate, who earned its third title in a row.

After the playoffs had ended, 1992 All-Patriot League women's soccer team honors were bestowed upon sophomore defender Jen Giordano and fiery attacker Lisa Gibbons '95 for their outstanding play this fall. Gibbons also finished with the second-highest number of goals (12) and overall points (32) in the league, and led the Bison in scoring.

Reflecting on the entire season, star forward Gibbons explained that "the [6-12-1] record did not show how good the team was." While most players were disappointed with the squad's overall performance in 1992, however, older players such as senior goalie Fekel realized that the team did itself proud considering its relative youth.

"We didn't quite get as far as I had hoped," said Fekel, who ended an illustrious career last Saturday at West Point, "but it can be attributed to a young team."

Fekel recorded four shutout games this past season and posted a solid 2.10 goals-against average over 19 games.

Regarding the future, Gibbons pointed out that the team's overall speed had to increase in order for it to equal the level of success of such teams as Army, Colgate, and Lafayette.

The team's quality of play will certainly be enhanced in this respect, though, when players are recruited for next season. Conventional wisdom, after all, says that the new additions of 1993 will make the team more competitive in the league, increase speed, and make players on the squad work harder as more women fight for fewer position openings. A combination of new and old, then, may prove to give Bucknell its first winning season ever.

Field hockey ends an OT short of .500

Bison lose to West Chester, tie formidable Lock Haven team after controversy over pre-game agreement

BY SCOTT GRISIN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Overtime. Injuries. Overtime. California. More overtime. And so went the 1992 Bucknell field hockey season. Finishing a respectable second in the Patriot League with a 2-2 record, the Bison (8-9-2) brought their season to an end this past week with a pair of home games.

On Saturday of Parents Weekend, the West Chester University field hockey team joined hundreds of parents in the annual pilgrimage to Bucknell. While some parents handed their sons and daughters food and money, though, the West Chester squad handed the Bison a 2-1 loss.

The visitors quickly took the lead with a goal ten minutes into the game, and they added another early in the second period to make the score 2-0. Bucknell again had trouble getting shots on goal, mustering up only a baker's dozen for the entire game.

All the same, one of these found its way from the stick of Steph Carfley '93 into the net with 2:52 remaining in the contest. Three minutes was not enough time for the Bison to score again, though, and the whistle blew with the score in favor of West Chester.

Solaida Mamsaang—The Bucknellian

Defenders Carolyn Zesk '96 (# 20) and Carrie Shultz '93 (#12) reach to steal the ball away from an opponent in a home game last week. The women's field hockey team fell just short of victory against a strong West Chester squad, 2-1.

Yesterday afternoon, Bucknell hosted Lock Haven for the final game of the season—and also one which could have made for a very fitting end to the year. Each team scored a goal apiece during regulation, with Bucknell's once again coming off of the stick of Carfley—her sixth of the season.

When the referee's watch hit triple zeroes, the score was still deadlocked at 1-1, and the players were ready for their eleventh overtime period of the season. The coaches, however, had agreed before the game that they would not play any overtime in the event that the game was tied. As a result, it went into the books as a tie, leaving the Bison with an 8-9-2 final record. The fact that no overtime period was played left many players disappointed, since a win would have bumped the Bison up to the .500 mark.

Nevertheless, the Bison will exit their 1992 campaign with good memories.

Coach Heather Lewis, in her first season with the team, did a great job and was well-liked by members of the squad. Kristin Allen '96 said, "We weren't sure what to expect with the new coach, but everyone was happy that she was here."

"Everybody got to like Heather," added Carfley. For the returning upperclassmen the transition to a new coach was difficult, but the team pulled together in the end.

"We were like the spokes of a common wheel," said Elizabeth Goodall '96.

Most players were happy with the way in which the season turned out, but many thought that the team's record could have been over .500.

"Overall I was pleased," said Jennifer Hayes '93. "We ended strong and on a good note, but we could have done better."

Despite its final record, the entire team seemed to enjoy the year immensely. The trip to California in October was widely viewed as the best part of the season, for obvious reasons, but also as a "bonding experience."

> "We were like the spokes of a common wheel."
> —Attacker Elizabeth Goodall '96

Seven seniors will not be returning next season, but they all had a great four years.

"I had a very positive experience with field hockey," said Carfley, who will enroll in law school next year.

"It's sad that it has to end," added Hayes. "I had some fun times." The senior plans to attend nursing school next fall.

The loss of seven starters leaves Bucknell with a young team for next year, which will be comprised of seven returning freshmen, two juniors, and only four seniors. This year's seniors believe that the 1993 Bison will be very successful, however.

"The freshmen were very supportive and an essential part of the team," commented Hayes. "Hard work will pay off for them next year."

Carfley added that Almira Baldwin '94 and Patricia Way '94 will be good leaders for next year's team.

"We'll have seven returning freshmen who will all be anxious to play," said freshman Goodall. "There will be a lot of enthusiasm, and I think enthusiasm is what makes us play well."

Tracey Willis '96 perhaps summed it all up best when she said, "I had the best time. All of the girls are great, and I can't wait until next year."

University officials visit Japan

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Several members of the Bucknell community recently returned from a whirlwind tour of the Far East, bringing back experiences and the possibility of future opportunities to expand Bucknell's horizons.

President Gary Sojka, assistant vice president for academic affairs and development Jim Rice, and Marsha Scott Gori, editor of Bucknell World, traveled to Japan at the end of October, and President Sojka and Rice managed to squeeze in visits to Hong Kong and Singapore in their nine-day trip as well.

President Sojka and Rice travelled together throughout Japan, visiting with Bucknell students and alumni, academic and corporate leaders, and the United States Ambassadors to Japan and Singapore. As President Sojka noted, Bucknell is trying to move in the direction of an expanded, more global curriculum and increased diversity in order to provide students with a broader view of the world, and the trip was directly related to these goals.

In relation to the trip, President Sojka referred to Foundations for the Future, a document passed by the faculty in 1991 outlining several goals for the University to meet the challenges of the future. One of common learning objectives put forth in this proposal is to develop international and multicultural perspectives.

This objective was incorporated into the Common Learning Agenda passed by the faculty last spring. The Common Learning Agenda calls for a new required course on "Perspectives on Human Diversity," which could be satisfied through a semester of study abroad.

President Sojka stated that one of the primary purposes of the trip was to increase the number of Asian students coming to Bucknell, in addition to providing more opportunities abroad for our students. He commented that the U.S. Ambassador to Singapore, Jon Huntsman, was "highly enthusiastic" about the possibility of a two-way exchange.

According to President Sojka, many Bucknell students travel abroad although Asian students traditionally have not come to Bucknell to study, and "only recently and in small numbers has that flow reversed." He added that he would like to see "a larger and steadier flow" of Asian students coming to Bucknell.

President Sojka and Rice met with the president of Doshisha University in Kyoto, home of the Associated Kyoto Program (AKP) which is popular among Bucknell students, and the vice chancellor of the National University of Singapore to discuss the possibility of future programs for both Asian and American students.

President Sojka said that many American universities are currently looking towards recruiting Japanese students as a way to increase enrollment and aid financial difficulties, but "we aren't interested in either of those things." Instead, he added, "we want a more cosmopolitan and diversified campus."

In order to gain more exposure for Bucknell and illustrate why this University is unique, President Sojka and Rice talked with an editorial writer for the Nihon Keizaiz Shinbun, a prestigious Japanese newspaper.

In many of their corporate visits, the President and Rice were encouraged to "establish an ongoing Bucknell presence in Japan." President Sojka said that this perhaps could be accomplished through a committee located in Japan to communicate on the school's behalf.

Five corporations located in Japan made commitments to sponsor Bucknell students in internships. Rice stated that they received "almost unanimous positive feedback" from the corporate leaders with whom they met.

As a break from the business and fund raising efforts of the trip, President Sojka and Rice were

Safe Rides assesses program following weekend incident

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Delta Delta Delta and the Department of Public Safety are presently working to implement several improvements in the Safe Rides program in response to an incident last weekend involving three program participants.

Director of Public Safety Vincent DeCerchio confirmed that on Saturday night the East Buffalo police contacted the Department of Public Safety with a report of suspicious individuals in an automobile near the stadium.

Upon investigation, public safety officers discovered that the individuals were three volunteers in the Safe Rides program. The students had possession of beer in the car and had been drinking.

The students were on probation for alcohol related conduct violations on campus and were serving as drivers for Safe Rides as part of the community service hours they had received as punishment.

DeCerchio declined to discuss the details of the incident stating that it is still in the hearing process.

According to Jennifer Stevens '93, Delta Delta Delta philanthropy chair and coordinator of the Safe Rides program, the incident has sparked an increased effort to ensure that drivers who volunteer for Safe Rides are aware of the responsibility they assume.

"Right now we are developing a set of rules that will have to be signed by each student who volunteers for the program," said Stevens.

As an added precaution, student IDs will be checked when drivers report to the Department of Public Safety.

In addition, although the department of public safety will continue to use Safe Rides for some types of community service and as a means to allow students to work off parking fines, the policy on what types of rule infractions may be worked off through the program will be more stringent, according to DeCerchio.

"We will not be using students who have been involved in certain kinds of conduct violations which would affect the integrity of the Safe Rides program," said DeCerchio.

> "We are upset about it but it's not time to give up. We're going to use it to make it better."
> — Jennifer Stevens '93

"There has never been a problem like this before," said Stevens. "I think the problem in this case is that these were students who had already been involved in disciplinary problems and had shown a lack of responsibility."

The Safe Rides program, sponsored by Delta Delta Delta, began last fall answering the need for a safe means of transportation for students on Friday and Saturday nights. According to DeCerchio, the service is heavily utilized receiving an average of 40 calls a night.

"I think it's a great program that provides a valuable service," said DeCerchio. "On Halloween we provided 78 Safe Rides."

Stevens emphasized that although she is disturbed by this incident, she intends to use as a way to make what is an already solid program even stronger.

"This is a new program and with every new program there are going to be problems," said Stevens. "We are upset about it but it's not time to give up. We're going to use this to make it better."

Football players question program

Rift between coach, players disrupts team

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With the Bucknell Bison football team in the midst of a 3-6 record, one might suspect that its players would be most upset because they are losing. However, according to members of the football team, there are more serious and deeply rooted problems which have caused a rift between Coach Lou Maranzana and his players.

Four upper-class members of the football squad agreed to talk with The Bucknellian on the condition that their names did not appear in this article. Each of these players said that he is either a member of the starting team, or that he receives a significant amount of playing time. Members of both the offense and defense are represented. Each player was interviewed separately, but the similarity of the responses suggests that there are several areas of concern within the football program. They identified Maranzana's coaching methods, his ability to motivate the team, his play calling decisions, possible racial stereotyping, and the treatment of players with injuries as problems that may explain, but also transcend, the team's win/loss record.

In addition, The Bucknellian spoke with two of the captains of the team, John Lusk '93, and David Berardinelli '93, and asked them to assess the merit of the players' concerns.

Lusk, who objected to the article, made it clear from the outset that, "I'm not going to say anything bad, about anybody."

All of the players described a feeling of disconnection that they said runs through the team: disconnection from the game itself as well as from the coach personally.

According to the players interviewed, the sport itself has lost something for the players, namely the aspect of fun. Player 1 explained that it is "not even the fact that we are losing. Every time we go out on the field for a practice or a game, it feels too business-oriented, like a job."

Player 2 echoed sentiments regarding this business-like tone. However, the sadness in his voice betrayed his stoic expression when he said, "It helps when you're winning, but football since I have been here really hasn't been fun. The fun has been taken out of football."

Players 3 and 4 said that the game has been fun from time to time, but that it has lost something from their playing days in high school.

Coach, athletic director assess situation

BY ANDREW COHEN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The athletic department will be conducting a "top to bottom evaluation to figure out where we're having problems with the football program at season's end," according to Athletic Director Rick Hartzell. Amid growing player concerns, Hartzell and Lou Maranzana, head coach of the football team, have begun to introspect upon the 1992-93 season, informally.

Hartzell acknowledged, "I'm really concerned about where we are in football, I'd be lying to you if I didn't say that I was. I don't think we can be satisfied with the results, and that goes for Lou and the players." Hartzell also said that he stood behind Maranzana, and that, "I don't judge his success strictly on wins and losses."

At a time when some members of the team have expressed concern over more than just the losing season, Maranzana discussed his perception of where the players are at this point in the season.

While some players questioned the team's overall morale, Maranzana saw the issue as "something that changes from week to week." He said that he sees morale not as a deeply rooted issue, but rather as something that reflects the fortunes of the team. "After the off-week, obviously we lost Travis in the Holy Cross game, and from then on, we've faced some adversity. The toughest visceral thing for the football team is that we came out against Fordham and did very very poorly, particularly on offense."

Maranzana said that he understood why his players may not be having fun since the team is not winning. However, he said, "That's a difficult thing for me to measure. And it is also a very important thing for me and also the rest of the football staff. One of our goals has got to be for the players to enjoy playing. And to enjoy playing in football is a very particular thing, it comes from winning."

Maranzana also said that players who feel that the sport is too business-oriented must understand that, "College football has many business-like aspects. At Bucknell it's kind of a quest, it's not a business and not totally a game either, it's something in between."

A major theme for some players is that there has never been a strong relationship between Maranzana and his team. However, Maranzana maintained, "I spend a lot of time getting to know them. I spend a lot of time in the office with them. People have different styles of dealing with Long hours of practice and a losing record, as well as attitude have led many members of the football team to feelings of frustration.

Casa shooting startles University community

BY MARIA GLOD AND DEB MANASSE

Less than a week after the shooting at La Casa De Pizza, Bucknellians are back munching on pizza and twirling spaghetti. Although the incident did not cause students to stay away from one of the most popular pizza places in Lewisburg many were surprised that the normally quiet college town is not immune to this kind of crime.

Students living off-campus were especially sensitive to the incident. "We were all really shocked to hear the news, especially in Lewisburg, and as a result we pay more attention and keep our door locked," said Sue Signori '93.

Last Sunday, Michael Allen Smith, an employee of La Casa De Pizza was standing behind the counter when George R. Bucher entered the restaurant and demanded that Smith leave with him.

When Smith refused to go, Bucher pulled out a .357 caliber handgun and shot Smith in the left hip. The gunman fled the scene to an awaiting car.

Bucher and a second individual drove out of Lewisburg, leading the chase to Milton. Police apprehended Bucher at Milton Village where he was found hiding in bushes.

"I think people are kind of surprised that something like this would happen in Lewisburg," said Liz Cologrisi '93, who lives in an apartment above Market Street Deli adjacent to Casa.

Employees of the restaurant said the incident has not affected business.

Mentor program gives students an edge

BY ALISA BLAND AND MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As the semester draws to a close and the need to face what comes after the bubble becomes imminent, students can be found interviewing, filling out applications and preparing to enter the 'real world'. The Multicultural Center and Career Development Center, have implemented a Mentor/Internship designed to assist students in their transition between the University and the world of business, industry, and government.

"The mentor program is not simply for minority students—it's available to everyone," said Alem Asres, director of multicultural affairs.

The mentor program pairs students with an alumnus in the working world in the student's field of study.

One role of the mentor is to give the student practical advice as to the types of courses that would be beneficial outside of the traditional degree requirements.

The mentor also gives the student a "foot in the door," a connection in the business world that can help the student find jobs or internships either with the mentor's company or with other corporations that the mentor is familiar with.

> "I thought it would be good to speak with someone already in the business world who would give me some real insight into the way things are done."
> —Emily Obara '93

Several students have already been matched with mentors.

"I thought it would be good to speak with someone already in the business world who would give me some real insight into the way things are done," said Emily Obara '93, a member of the program. "So far it's been a very positive experience," added Obara.

"When students graduate, they have very little exposure to the world outside," said Asres. The program is designed to expand student horizons and to prepare them for the situations they will face after graduation. "It creates a new family in the profession who will take pride in passing on their art," said Asres.

Asres instituted a similar program at the University of Maryland. According to Asres, the program will help students test career choices, identify the organizations with which they can grow personally and professionally, and develop personal skills and contacts to make them more competitive in today's job market. The mentor program currently has 34 professional mentors representing professions ranging from medicine to engineering to marketing to law.

These professionals are volunteering their time and resources to assist students in achieving their academic and professional goals. Proctor & Gamble and 3M are two major companies already involved in the program.

More mentors will be added a variety of fields to accommodate student demand.

Bucknell Student Government President, Mike Thomas '94, led a sparsely attended open forum last evening in the L.C. Forum to discuss students' concerns, as well as to solicit their opinions on where the school should channel its funds. The forum was organized in preparation for the arrival of the Board of Trustees this weekend.

Thomas explained to the ten men and women in attendance that Bucknell is preparing to launch a three to four year, $100 million capital campaign, and he asked the audience to suggest ways in which the money might be spent.

Brian Sipes —The Bucknellian
Students in attendance gave their input on what should be addressed by the Trustees.

Scott Perricelli '94 suggested the University revamp its financial aid system to contend with the inequalities inherent in the present system of allotment.

"Last year, the first people to get accepted off the wait list were people who could afford to pay for their full education," Perricelli said.

Another student suggested the school look into the maintenance of the upper-class residence halls such as Trax and Roberts, which, he added, are in need of repair.

Thomas also answered questions about the seating situation in Davis Gym for the upcoming basketball season. He said the University is looking to ensure that the gymnasium does not exceed capacity at any of its games this season, and has taken steps to ensure this, by limiting the number of tickets available.

Doug Halbert '94 suggested that Bucknell make changes to the computer services on campus, which he described as inadequate.He suggested that they connect all of the IBM computers around campus, similar to the Macintosh system, as well as better educate the staff in computer services.

Brian Sipes —The Bucknellian
Michael Thomas '93, BSG president led an open forum allowing students to voice concerns.

Thomas said he was pleased with how the forum went, despite its poor attendance."This is a great way for students to help out the University and air some grievances they might have at the same time," he concluded.

"Hopefully this will help the trustees with some of the decisions they will consider in the future."

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Friday, November 6

Several Public Safety officers responded at 8 p.m. to the east side bleacher area of the stadium for an injured fan during a high school football game. Upon investigation of the injury and interviewing other fans, it was discovered that juvenile had thrown a piece of metal which did strike another fan in the head. East Buffalo Township police were notified and charges are pending through their office.

A Public Safety officer observed a Bucknell student consuming what appeared to be an alcoholic beverage at 11:15 p.m. during a fraternity house party. She was identified and found to be under twenty one years of age. Charges are pending.

At 11:35 p.m. an officer observed a Bucknell student consuming an alcoholic beverage at a registered party. A check of the person's identification revealed that he was under twenty one years of age. Charges are pending.

Saturday, November 7

At 12:01 a.m. an officer responded to Hunt Hall on the report of an injured student. The student was transported to Evangelical Hospital by a Student Health Service driver where she was treated for a knee contusion and released.

Officers responded to Harris Hall at 4:42 a.m. on the report that a theft was in progress. Upon their arrival, an unknown person(s) did attempt to reach a second floor stairway window by stepping on an air conditioner unit. The suspect was confronted at the window by the victim and fled the scene. Damage to the air conditioner was temporarily repaired.

A custodian in Larison Hall reported at 8 a.m. that two criminal acts had taken place within the last twenty four hours. A candy machine was vandalized by breaking the display windows and removing six or seven packs of vending items. In addition, curtains in the men's restroom had been torn off the windows.

A student in Vedder Hall reported at 12:12 a.m. that several compact discs and a tapestry were removed from her room between 3 a.m. and 3:30 a.m. The victim stated that her room door was not locked.

Sunday, November 8

At 1:15 a.m. an officer responded to the Phi Psi fraternity house for an alarm activation. An unknown person(s) did discharge a fire extinguisher from the first floor to the basement area for no reason. The dust from the extinguisher caused the alarm system to activate.

Officers responded at 1:32 a.m. to a report of vandalism in progress in the Langone Center. It was discovered that unknown person(s) did throw a "lounge" style chair and trash can down the stairwell inside of the Langone Center. In addition, both bathrooms, hallways and the Terrace Room floors were soaked with beer. The senior class party was held in the Terrace Room this date.

At 2:20 a.m. a Public Safety student supervisor witnessed a Bucknell student bend the antenna on a car parked in the lower Harris parking lot. Suspect was apprehended and identified. Victim requested that the suspect be cited by the Lewisburg police. Charges are pending.

At 1:10 a.m. an East Buffalo Township police officer reported to the Department of Public Safety that there was a vehicle driving around to the rear of the stadium with no lights. Public Safety officers responded and discovered that the three occupants were consuming alcoholic beverages while performing "Safe Rides" for the university community. All were already on disciplinary probation and were relieved of duty at that time. University charges are pending.

Public Safety officers were requested at 4:36 a.m. to respond to the Lewisburg police station to pick up an intoxicated student. This student had been located near Perkins knocking on doors. The student was cited for public drunkenness and underage drinking by the Lewisburg officer. He was then transported to the Hospital for treatment of a cut chin received prior to the officer's arrival.

At 5:25 while returning the above student to his room, officers discovered a Bucknell student was wearing a wrist band which designates that a person is of drinking age at social functions. It was discovered that this student was under twenty one years of age. Investigation is continuing to determine where the wrist band was obtained.

Tuesday, November 10

Officers were dispatched to the Langone Center at 10 a.m. for a vehicle accident. A Bucknell employee driving the BU mail truck did back into a student vehicle while backing into the Langone Center mailroom. There were no injuries and the student vehicle received moderate damage to the passenger side front door.

At 11:20 p.m. officers responded to Swartz Hall on the report of a student in possession of a pellet gun. Gun was located by the responding officers with the assistance of a resident director and was returned to the office of Public Safety. Charges are pending.

Swartz hall residents express discontent

BY WAYNE FERBERT
BucknellianStaff Writer

Residential rooms in the A and B wings of Swartz hall were converted from singles to doubles last summer to accommodate housing needs created by sophomore rush. Despite the fact that these rooms were originally constructed to house two students, the rooms had not been doubles since 1985.

"Overcrowded and overpriced" has become the battle cry of many of the students residing in Swartz A & B who have begun to complain about the size and cost of the rooms. In response, BSG has taken the students' concerns under advisement and are considering a motion in an attempt to alleviate such problems.

The rooms are long and narrow. Running along the length of each side of the room is a closet dresser, bed, and desk. These three items run from the door to the window leaving one long, narrow space in between.

Students complain about the lack of space and freedom involved in such a room. Compounding the problem is the fact that only some of the rooms have beds that can be stacked to make bunk beds.

The cost per student living in one of these rooms is $2170 per year. Although the rooms in Swartz A & B are the least expensive on campus, the same rooms that students are being charged a combined rate of $4340 for this year cost roughly $2500 just last semester as singles.

Four additional resident assistants were brought on and an additional bed was purchased for each room. The increased number of students is accompanied by an increase in electric, and water costs. No additional cleaning staff were hired for Swartz hall.

Brian Sipes —The Bucknellian
Joshua Brinen '94, lived in a Swartz Hall single last year. This room, like all others in wings A and B, have since been converted into doubles. Questions have been raised about the cost of these rooms.

According to Gerald Commerford, Assistant Dean for Housing, the university is realizing a windfall gain but the cost of the rooms is not out of line with the cost structure for housing on campus.

If one takes a look at the price of these rooms when they were doubles in 1985 and prorates the price using the yearly percentage increase in housing since 1985, the cost of the rooms now is only slightly higher.

Information about whether or not the price in 1985 was protested was not available. Since 1985, however, air-conditioning, carpeting, and an extra bathroom per floor have been installed.

The problems associated with living in such cramped quarters are numerous. Many students said that studying in the rooms has become difficult.

"Last year I would study in my room all the time but I never find myself studying in my room this year. As a matter of fact, I'm not here very often at all. It's just not comfortable in here," says Eric Hammond, '95.

Many students have expressed a desire to relocate and few have been accommodated.

Every student residing in Swartz A & B that was interviewed stated that they thought that a rebate on the price of the rooms was in order. However, a price decrease or rebate is unlikely, according to Dean Commerford.

He states that the issue of a price decrease was discussed but that he has not heard about, nor expects to hear about, a rebate. Commerford said that several students and parents have contacted the offices of Residential Life seeking such a discount.

Computer lab overcrowding exacerbated by instructional use

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Accessing a computer on campus has become increasingly difficult for most Bucknell students. Limited terminal availability is the end result of a chain of computer relocations and laboratory reassignments.

Over the summer, Computer Services renovated computer laboratories and upgraded systems to higher capacities.

A major consequence of the changes is that the Macintosh lab in Coleman Hall is now being used for classroom purposes during the day.

A color projection system was installed in the Coleman lab to make the room more suitable for instructional purposes. To make the room less crowded, Computer Services staff removed some of the terminals.

Because they do not have this lab available to them most of the day, many students flock to labs in the Library or Dana Engineering, overcrowding the areas and limiting the number of free terminals.

Jon Eschinger, director of Computer Services, said that "it's a balancing act between making facilities available to students and having facilities available to faculty for teaching purposes."

"The Coleman lab has been identified as one facility that can be scheduled on a regular basis for classes during the day and is getting heavily used."

Eschinger said that more and more departments are wanting to schedule labs for their classes. The math department, for example, is beginning to use the Mathematica program and therefore have the need for classroom labs.

"Presumably lab instruction is valuable for students taking those classes," he said, "and it is our responsibility to try to accommodate as many students as possible."

Josh Klatt—The Bucknellian
Macintosh computer labs are consistently filled to capacity causing students to wander aimlessly around the campus in an attempt to fulfill their word prossessing needs.

Even after school hours when the computers in the Coleman lab are available for non-classroom use, students say it is still difficult to find a free terminal.

"After three o'clock in the afternoon it's impossible to find a computer," said Bonni Turner '95. "Sometimes it's easier to find an open computer when everyone else is at dinner," she said, "but for the rest of the night it's hard."

"I usually have to go to the lab during the dinner hour or after ten o'clock at night," said Ryan Kraus '95. Finding a computer available any time other than that, he said, is nearly impossible.

Old computers that had been replaced by upgraded versions were moved to labs in the basement of Hunt Hall, Smith Hall, and the Roser Gateway.

"A lot of people from the Gateways use the Roser lab," said Jen Scheib '93, and a student can usually find an open computer there. "But the printers are less than adequate. A laser printer would be beneficial to the students who use the lab instead of having to run up to Dana or to the Computer Center to print things out."

Finding an open computer is bad enough, students feel, but waiting for the data to print out is even worse. "It's like 'data printing rush hour'," said Matt Evans '95, when he tries to print out a paper. There are so many people trying to use the printers at one time, he said, that "the printers just get overloaded, and either your paper gets lost and is printed somewhere else, or does not get printed at all."

In order to alleviate this problem, some students have resorted to purchasing their own word processors. But for those students who do not have either a word processor or a personal computer in their dormitory room, accessing a computer anytime between 7 a.m. and 11 p.m. is a frustrating and aggravating task.

"We may not have done as good as a job as we could have but it wasn't because of a lack of effort," Eschinger said. "I'm not saying that there is not a problem. We are looking ahead to changes that can be made for next year to try to correct what is wrong. It is certainly not too early for students to get their oar in the water and express their ideas or concerns."

Application deadline for off-campus housing approaches

NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian
Craig Beach '93 and Scott Breuninger '93 relax in their apartment on St. George Street. Many upperclass students opt to live off-campus.

For the second year, students who wish to live off-campus must apply for approval from the Office of Residential Life. This result of the four-year residency requirement, is part of the Trustee Implementation Program.

Any student who wishes to live in town must submit an application to Residential Life by November 20, according to Assistant Dean for Housing Gerald Commerford. Approved students will be notified by mail after December 15.

"The early deadline gives students sufficient time to look for a place in town if they are approved," Commerford said.

Only a certain number of students are permitted to live off-campus each year. This number is the result of projections as to the number of students in residence halls during the following academic year.

"We take the number of spaces in fraternity houses and sorority suites into consideration, as well as the number of students expected to participate in off-campus study programs, and the number of students expected to live in residence next year," Commerford said. "It is not by any means an exact science."

This year, a maximum of 470 students will be allowed to live off- campus. Members of fraternities and sororities are not permitted to live off campus unless their houses or suites are filled to capacity.

Approval for off-campus housing is based on class year and priority. "Priority" includes students who live at home, are married, or have children. Student conduct, both before and after the decision is made, is also a factor in the decision.

"If a student has been found guilty, or has plead guilty, to a violation of a University regulation, that matter will be reviewed by the Off-Campus Living Review Board," Commerford said.

The board consists of John Dunlop, dean of students, Ed Dadez, associate dean of student life, a representative from the Bucknell Student Government, and a representative from town.

"If a student is approved, and then their behavior changes, the approval can be retracted," Commerford noted.

Students who are denied permission to live off-campus may appeal the decision to the board.

Students presently living off-campus who have been cited by Lewisburg Police and have been turned down may also appeal to the board.

Last year, twenty students were denied permission to live off campus, but many appealed. In the end, only six students were eliminated from the program.

Last year, the maximum number of students allowed to live off-campus was also 470, but fewer than 470 students applied. Only 399 students, not including commuters, currently live in town.

As a result of fewer off-campus residents, eighty-seven students were housed in converted Swartz singles. "If the situation were ideal, Swartz A and B would be singles again," Commerford said.

Applications to live off-campus were distributed through campus mail in mid-October. Students who wish to apply may pick up applications in the Office of Residential Life.

Students presently living off-campus are required to file an application if they wish to remain off-campus during 1993-94 Applications must be submitted by November 20.

able to visit Reverend Fukushima, Zen Master of the Tofukuji Monastery in Kyoto and the Head Abbot of the Rinzai Sect of Buddhism in Japan. Fukushima, a close friend of associate professor of religion Mary Evelyn Tucker, travelled to campus last spring to meet with Bucknell students.

Rice stated that Fukushima made a "remarkable offer," as he "offered to host short-term visits from Bucknell students who are interested in learning about Zen Buddhism."

While on their trip, President Sojka, Rice, and Gori all visited with alumni and Bucknell students that are currently abroad, including those with the AKP. All three noted that these students do miss Bucknell, and would appreciate any mail from their friends here.

Gori, who travelled to Japan to research a cover story for the March issue of Bucknell World, was able to stay with two Japanese families during her trip, one of which currently has a student at Bucknell. She felt an "extreme openness" from the Japanese, who wanted to know about her work, and similarities and differences between the cultures.

Gori remarked that she was "fascinated by the [Japanese] culture and the Westernization," stating, "our culture is definitely infiltrating their lifestyle." In both of her host families, the daughters were preparing to be professionals, and the families "looked for fuller educational experiences" for their children.

This trip was part of Bucknell's continous effort to expand the University's international focus and increase cultural awareness.

Season tickets now available

Season tickets have gone on sale for this year's Breakin' Bison basketball home games. These reserved seats are available to the campus community for $50 per-season ticket.

The ticket is valid for all regular season games, but sales are limited to 500 seats. The general public may purchase season tickets for $100 per seat.

Caine lectures on freedom of speech

Burton Caine, professor of law at Temple University, will give the lecture "Freedom of Speech After 200 Years" Wednesday, November 18 at 7:30 p.m. in the Langone Center Gallery Theater.

The lecture will explore how the absolute protection of speech contained in the First Amendment has been affected by exceptions allowed by the U.S. Supreme Court.

Chapel is looking for ringers

The Rooke Chapel Ringers are looking for "extra" ringers to participate in the Christmas Candlelight Service.

Participants must be available for all four services on December 5, 6, 7 and 9 as well as attend one rehearsal. Experience is not required.

Transportation offered to airports

Airport shuttle transportation is being offered to Williamsport or Harrisburg over Thanksgiving break.

Reservations will be accepted until noon on Friday, November 20. Reservations are required for any of the two trips per day to the two airports.

Interested parties may contact Judy Martin at the Office of Transportation in Marts Hall.

Goldwater scholarship nominees sought

Bucknell has been invited to nominate six current sophomores and juniors for the Barry M. Goldwater Scholarship program for students who plan careers in mathematics, natural sciences or engineering.

Criteria for selection include U.S. citizenship, the candidate's intent to pursue a career in math, science or engineering, and rank in the upper quartile of the class (i.e. a 3.4 grade point average).

Three hundred scholarships covering tuition, fees, books, room and board up to a maximum of $7,000 for each undergraduate year will be offered. Names of possible nominees should be submitted to John Pyper no later than Monday, November 30.

Marshall newspaper names rape victim

A student newspaper at Marshall University recently published the name and address of a rape victim. She does not attend the West Virginia school and the alleged attack occurred off campus.

The paper's editor said that the newspaper's "journalistic dedication to fairness" mandated that it print the woman's name. He felt that the paper is a vehicle for social change and one of their responsibilities as such is to move forward and stop treating the victims of sexual assault as if they should be ashamed.

The paper's editorial board voted four votes to three in favor of printing the woman's name.

Court denies students' appeal

The U.S. Supreme Court rejected claims by State University of New York students that mandatory student activity fees should not be used to support the New York Public Interest Research Group (NYPIRG), a non-profit research and environmental advocacy group.

The students had argued that using funds to support groups that some students oppose is a violation of their First Amendment right to freedom of speech. Students stated that they were opposed to the NYPRIG's causes and methods, and were dismayed to find themselves financing them.

A spokesman for the university has said that the NYPRIG reflects a wide range of views and funding these views is a proper use of student fees.

Computerized GREs now available

As of October 12, students may schedule appointments to take the Graduate Record Examination by computer at one of more than 100 Sylvan Learning Centers nationwide at and some universities as well.

Advantages to taking the test by computer are that the process is faster because upon completing one section the student may immediately continue on to the next; and the score is available immediately and is reported to the student's home university within three weeks, rather than the four to six weeks required with the traditional test.

Students receive thirty minutes of instruction on how to use the computer and then take the test. The test can be administered in small groups, instead of in a room with hundred of people. Total cost for the test is $90, double the cost of the traditional test.

Hostages held at Duke

An escaped prisoner who grabbed a gun from a lockbox at the Guilford County jail in North Carolina was shot and killed by police after he took four women hostage and held them in a Duke University building for more than two hours.

The gunman held the women hostage while demanding a getaway vehicle and that police leave the area. He had been awaiting trial on burglary charges when he escaped from jail, stole a car, and drove sixty miles east toward Duke University in Durham.

Racing to hear an ark of stories

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Imagine, if you will, a young Spalding Gray who works at a table in a flea market. Now imagine a choose-your-own-adventure play in which the audience decides the structure of the story. Sound bizarre? It's the newest play by returning alumnus W. David Hancock '84, titled The Race of the Ark Tattoo.

The play, which premiered in September in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, will be presented tonight and tomorrow night in the Tustin Studio Theatre at 8 p.m. Tickets are $3 ($2.50 with BUID) and available at the door.

The Race of the Ark Tattoo is a one-character play about a man named Foster, played by Iowa City playwright and actor Todd Ristau, who works as a flea market vendor. Foster tells the audience about his deceased foster parent, Mr. Phinney, who used to allow his children to pick objects from his story "ark," an old toy winnebago, and then would make up elaborate stories about the origin of the object.

Foster, who inherited the winnebago, passes it around to the audience members and tells different stories based on the objects they pick from the "ark." Among the various objects are a child's sock, a jar of Vaseline, a porn magazine, and a beer bottle.

"The audience will really determine the direction and ending of the play because they will be choosing the objects at random," said Ristau. "The play is basically a 40-page monologue with humor. As soon as the audience starts picking objects, I tell stories about each object and all those stories help tell a complete story about what type of person Phinney was, and what type of person Foster is."

Ristau establishes his relationship to the audience before the play the even begins, holding an actual flea market prior to the performance. Audience members can wheel and deal with Ristau at his vending table for objects similar to those found in the ark.

"Audience participation is definitely essential," said Ristau. "This actually makes it more enjoyable for everyone involved. The audience is allowed to participate from the beginning, and that will help my performance since I will be interacting with them."

The Race for the Ark Tattoo is directed by David Gothard, a founding director of London's famed Riverside Studios, and one of Europe's leading theatre artists.

> "With this play, I decided to keep the storytelling and make the stories a vital part of the play."
> —David Hancock

Gothard points to the realism of Hancock's characters and his ability to find the bitter humor in life. "His characters instantly become real acquaintances and friends of my actual world," Gothard said. "I believe that this is due to the strong humanism of Hancock's work, which allows fear to give way to humor and incidents to become instantly and firmly part of the geography of American writing."

The second in a trilogy of plays by Hancock, The Race for the Ark Tattoo, grew from the playwright's own experiences at flea markets.

"I used to go to a lot of flea markets and just look at all of the objects and make up stories about how they wound up there and where they came from," said Hancock. "With this play, I decided to keep the storytelling and make the stories a vital part of the play."

What Hancock hoped to do was to expose the superficial structure of a plot. The emphasis in this play, rather, is on the art of telling a story. Ristau lives the play moment to moment, instead of relying on the conventions of a beginning, middle, and end.

Hancock, Gothard, and Ristau spent a month of eight-hour rehearsal days preparing for the performance of The Race of the Ark Tattoo. Although Hancock contributed minorly to the directing of the play, he generally allowed Gothard and Ristau to experiment with the execution of his work.

"I think it's a very bad playwright who goes into the rehearsal process with a set idea of what the play's about," said Hancock. "You've basically got two years of work and a lifetime of experience condensed into an hour and half. It's (the play) is bigger than you and smarter than you. You have to not be afraid of letting the actor teach you something about the text."

Hancock, who was active in theatre while at Bucknell, went on to receive his MFA from the University of Iowa. His first play to be produced, The Chevy Death, was premiered at Bucknell during his undergraduate career.

Hancock will next work on completing his trilogy of plays about what he calls "hidden museum." His first play, The Convention of Cartography, was premiered in Cedar Springs last fall. Recently Hancock received a Diverse Vision Grant to complete the third, Exploring the Incubus Archives.

A tour de force in breaking theater conventionalities, Hancock's play is not to be missed—even if it is only to poke around the flea market and haggle with the actors. The Race of the Ark Tattoo promises a unique and entertaining evening of fun.

Orchestra premieres concert tonight

BY JASON SPIEGELMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

On Wednesday, November 8, at 8:30 p.m. the Bucknell University Orchestra will present its fall concert. This will be the first opportunity for members of the Bucknell community to hear the group this year. The concert will be comprised of five selections celebrating the works of various composers: The Concerto in G by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart with soloist Rebecca Packer, L'arlesienne Suite #1 by Georges Bizet, Overture to Russia and Ludmilla by Michael Glinka, and Polovetsian Dances by Alaxander Borodine. The concert will be free and open to the public.

Christopher Para, Assistant Professor of Music, is the current musical director and conductor of the Bucknell Orchestra. Having recently returned from a semester's leave during which time he traveled to England, Para has much praise for English musicians. "I came in contact with many fine musicians and many educators," said Para, "and it was amazing how similar their situation is to ours."

Para has been conducting the Bucknell Orchestra since his appointment to faculty in 1989, having been a visiting professor the previous year. According to him, "the orchestra has changed immensely in that time. For example, it used to be a group of 14 players, and is now a group of 70." At his first concert as the conductor here, Para had to hire over 20 outside musicians to fill the parts. In next Wednesday's concert, only one outside musician has been contracted.

Concertmistress Rebecca Packer will be the featured soloist in the Mozart violin concerto. Now a senior, she has been the concertmistress since her sophomore year at Bucknell.

Although the concertmaster/mistress is often the person selected to be a soloist, next year there will be an open competition within the orchestra for any senior orchestra member wishing to play a concerto.

The Orchestra has had rehearsals every week on Wednesday nights from 7:00 to 9:30, and the upcoming concert will reflect a lot of that hard work and preparation. Para feels that it is important not only to give live performances, but for people to take advantage of them as well. "With people buying CD's by the thousands, I think that it is crucial for them to come and support live music that is being made by their fellow members of the Bucknell community," stated Para.

Celebrate the season with The Nutcracker

To honor The Nutcracker's 100th anniversary, the Ballet Theatre Pennsylvania (BTP) of Wilkes-Barre will produce two performances of the Russian ballet. The piece, by Russian composer Tchaikovsky, was first performed on December 18, 1892 at the Maryinsky Theatre in St. Petersburg.

The Ballet Theatre Pennsylvania's production will include five Russian dancers in its troupe. Trinette Singleton, ballet mistress for BTP, said, "Their [the Russian Dancers] traditional heritage and their love for Tchaikovsky and The Nutcracker bring a feeling of excitement to the ballet. All the dancers respond to that inspiration with an enormous surge of energy that results in the most dynamic virtuosity of any performance of The Nutcracker."

After performing in Wilkes-Barre, the company will take The Nutcracker on a fifteen city tour throughout the United States and Canada.

The Nutcracker will run Sunday, November 22nd at 2 p.m. and Friday, November 27th at 8 p.m. Tickets cost $14 and $16 and area available at half-price to students. Call 826-1100 for more infromation.

It's time to take Safe Rides seriously

Don't require students to participate and educate volunteers of their responsibilities, restrictions

Had too much to drink to safely drive a car? Left behind by your friends and stuck to walk home alone? Scared of what kind of crazy character you might meet on the way downhill? For over a year now, responsible students have been calling Safe Rides for a reliable, secure mode of transportation. Be careful, however. Last Saturday night your escorts could have been three men who not only carried their own supply of alcoholic beverages, but had also indulged in them.

How did such a well-meaning and successful program attract such irresponsible and unthinking individuals? It didn't. These three thoughtless students were required to provide Safe Rides as a form of community service. This "community service" that they were offering was a punishment issued to them for, ironically enough, alcohol related conduct violations.

They may be laughing over their little joke, but members of campus, who should value this excellent and much-needed service, should not be. They should desire only trustworthy individuals to escort them home.

For this reason, Safe Ride escorts need to be screened. No one ever should be required to perform Safe Rides. This goes against the spirit of the program—students volunteering to provide a service for each other. Those students who need to perform community service can just as easily rake leaves or get out of bed early on Saturday morning to pick up the previous evening's party debris. No student who is sensible enough to call for a Safe Ride needs to deal with another student who has already been proven to be at least somewhat irresponsible.

Volunteers to the program, especially those who are escorting to pay off parking tickets, need to be made aware of their responsibilities and restrictions. Perhaps a contract, similar to the one that is required to operate a University vehicle, even needs to be signed. On the current University contract, it is explicitly stated that the driver may not use alcohol prior to or while driving.

While anyone at the college level should know by now that drinking and driving do not mix, this would reinforce the fact. Signing one's name to a contract makes one think about his or her responsibilities as a driver.

In general, Safe Rides needs to be taken more seriously. It is not just some form of makeshift security. Restoring Safe Rides to the volunteer-only program that it once was will take some effort and educating. While it would be wonderful to think that all students can be trusted to be responsible, the truth is that they simply cannot.

Clinton will set back Reagan revolution

TO THE EDITOR:

Despite a Gallup poll taken only days prior to the election showing the race in a statistical dead-heat, Bill Clinton managed to steal the popular vote on what will inevitably be dubbed "Black Tuesday". George Bush's loss is solely attributable to his abandonment of Ronald Reagan's tried and true policies of lowering taxes, deregulating, and holding the line on the Democratic Congress' penchant for pork-barrel spending and subsidies. The President's acceptance of the Democrat's $275 billion tax increase also insured our lingering recession. But like a noble statesman, President Bush has accepted full responsibility for his broken promises and lackadaisical campaign effort that resulted in the G.O.P.'s November downfall.

Revisionists will contort the Grand Old Party's twelve years of glory into twelve years of wide-spread unemployment, military aggression, disregard for the environment, and a declining standard of living.

Now that a tax-and-spend liberal has been elected, what shall happen to the Conservative revolution that started with Ronald Reagan's victory in 1980? The media and liberal activists will almost assuredly construe Clinton's victory as a general rebuke of Conservatism and failed Reagan/Bush "trickle-down" economics. Revisionists will contort the Grand Old Party's twelve years of glory into twelve years of wide-spread unemployment, military aggression, disregard for the environment, and a declining standard of living. With Bill Clinton as President, America can expect the media and revisionists to label the 1980's, "a decade of greed" and "a decade of contempt for the poor, elderly, homeless, and minorities".

If the voters were exposed to the unadulterated facts instead of Bill Clinton's "Are you better off now?" rhetoric that the media thrived on, public sentiment would have unanimously been pro-Bush. When Carter took office in 1976 there were 22 Communist countries compared to 5 today. Since 1977 public housing has increased by over 250,000 units, the price of oil has decreased by $0.26, and the highest federal income tax rate has gone from a whopping 70% to 31%. Median real income among black families fell 15% from 1973 to 1980, then rose 16% from 1982 to 1990, and the average family income of the bottom 20% has increased 77% since 1977. The percentage of households victimized by crime has fallen from 31.3% in 1977 to 23.2% today. The standard of living in America is still second to none and American worker productivity vastly exceeds that of even Japan and Germany. The economic facts are clear and straightforward. From 1982 to 1991 the United States flourished with economic growth in 106 out of 108 months. These figures are clearly a tribute to twelve prosperous years of Republicans in the White House.

Unfortunately, the public has been convinced America is weakening and inferior by its President-elect. Mr. Clinton is a firm believer that one can tax the nation into prosperity. With Clinton as President and a Democrat majority in Congress, much will be accomplished. Unfortunately these achievements have historically been painful to the American taxpayer. After four years of higher taxes, over-regula-

Hartzell responds to football criticisms

TO THE EDITOR:

This letter is in response to the letter printed in last week's paper from Betsy Kilbury Foster '59, in regard to the "offensive behavior" of the football team as they came on the field during the Shikellamy marching band performance on Parents' Day. I would like to offer the facts in this matter.

The band was invited to provide the pre-game entertainment. As always the Shik band was impressive and well-received. We enjoy having them at Bucknell and hope they will return.

In the week prior to the game, I sent the Shik band director a game timing sheet. In this schedule all events surrounding the game are detailed. We work off of a league mandated 1:00 p.m. kickoff time. This schedule is the same one that the coaches and teams use to plan their preparation for the game. Not only did I send this detailed itinerary to the band director but I personally covered the itinerary with both the director and his assistant prior to their performance. Unfortunately, the band was four minutes late entering the stadium, they warmed up on the field, and they began their 14 minute show approximately six minutes late.

Our team waited to come on the field until 2:00, where they remained until kickoff; this is four minutes later than usual, as the team was waiting for the band to complete their performance. However, it was necessary for the team to come on the field when they finally did, in order to make the kickoff time. Because of this, some people have interpreted the team's arrival on the field while the band was playing as offensive and frightening. It should be remembered that the event was scheduled as a football game. We certainly did not intend to "frighten" the band members.

There are nearly always two sides to every story. This case is no different. I would like to applaud our coaches and team members (and several others of us) who simply ignored the derogatory comments that were offered toward us by some members of the Shikellamy party as they left the stadium.

Student calls for magazine buying courtesy

TO THE EDITOR:

It is time for this campus to stop its sexist, exclusionary, and downright unfair policies. I think that the place to start is the bookstore magazine area. If we are ever to shake the many labels that this campus is tagged with, then I think that a few simple suggestions might help.

The first thing that we need to do is to keep students, and even faculty members, from reading magazines before they buy them, or in some cases reading them and not buying them at all. The problem here is that this is an exclusionary policy.

Those people that sit or stand reading their magazines (called "readers" hereafter) are excluding the population of this campus that buys "girlie" magazines (i.e. Playboy, Penthouse), by sitting in front of that area. For the most part those buyers are males, so what we wind up with is sexism. Not only is there sexism against males though, there is also sexism against females. Those same readers also sit in front of Vanity Fair, Sassy and other female oriented magazines.

Sexism is not the only problem though, there is also a little too much conservative motivation in the practice of the readers. Please excuse the generalization, but for the most part buyers of the "rock" magazines(Spin, Rolling Stone, etc.) are more liberal, in terms of beliefs. Once again the readers are excluding, in this case some of the liberals on this campus.

The solution to this problem is rather simple, let's pick our magazine(s) and get out of the way. I think I speak for a large portion of this campus when I ask for this sexist, exclusionary policy to be stopped. All that I am asking for is a little bit of courtesy, that same courtesy that you will hopefully soon be showing in the mailroom when it is crowded. Let us not be divided in our quest to shake the labels. We will not be labeled anymore! Thank you.

Student addresses sexual double standards article

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to address the article, "Sexual double standards must be challenged" by Samantha Schivers (November 6 Bucknellian, page 7).

Ms. Schivers makes the point that the labels "whore," "slut," and "tease" are men's invented terms to control and judge women's sexuality, a typical labeling strategy that society imposes upon women in order to oppress them. I would like to expand upon her discussion, however, to offer an explanation as to why these terms still exist as symbols of women's oppression in our culture and how we can deconstruct them.

The fact, first of all, that not only men but also women buy into these labels and use them as dismissing, reductive ways of degrading other women is problematic. Ms. Schivers says, "I will admit I think everybody at one time or another has been a whore, slut, or tease, but this applies equally to men." When women acknowledge the meaning of these words as legitimate ways of describing other women, we acknowledge the validity of these derogatory words. To call a woman a "whore," "slut," "tease," "bitch," "dyke", for example, is to support the patriarchy, and to oppress the sexuality and sexual choices of every woman.

Second, Samantha Schivers suggests that men have fewer boundaries with regards to their sexuality, which is true. She proposes that equally offensive names should exist for "promiscuous men." I disagree. Is not that kind of tactic a copy-cat of the oppressive, misogynistic society that women have endured in this country for centuries? If we truly were a nation which was built upon the rights of the individual, we would not constantly scrutinize the sexual choices and preferences of our friends, family, and public figures, especially those of women.

I propose, finally, that there is something both women and men can do to combat these oppressive labels. The tone of Ms. Schivers's final paragraph is one of despair. "And you can not file a sexual harassment complaint against the entire male sex. I have tried. Well, okay, so I haven't. But I know it can't be done." Something can be done to limit sexist remarks. Both men and women can refuse to use labels to describe women in a derogatory fashion. We can refuse to laugh at the sexist, homophobic jokes generated about us. When we confront and challenge the misogynist intentions behind labels and jokes, we deconstruct their meanings. And when deconstruction happens, the stereotypes, the expectations, and the judgments made about our behavior will cease to restrict and diminish us.

OPINIONS

Political correctness: tolerance or nuisance

PC is a human, not a political, issue

BY JOHN STITH

Put all the grandiose arguments aside. The question: What words should you, a student in Lewisburg, PA, use to describe people? Here's how I decided.

It was the first day of my Bucknell life, and the 27 of us were trying to act casual. On the surface we were simply having a good time at our hall meeting; inside, we all feared our roommates hated us.

About halfway through the meeting our R. A. explained why we should say "woman" instead of "girl." We were stunned. The idea had never occurred to some of us. Was our R. A. crazy? There was only one way to find out.

We men simply asked the . . . people of the opposite sex . . . what they wished to be called. They thought about it for a moment and unanimously agreed on "woman."

As long as women are being raped, homosexuals are being "bashed," and a million other crimes against humanity are happening, can you blame people for considering a slur to be a threat?

The matter was from that moment settled. Call people what they want to be called.

Are words like "woman" and "first-year" inconvenient? Sure they are, but they are also important. Using "politically correct" words shows that you care about the people around you. Insisting on disrespectful or prejudicial words simply shows your belief that you are right. It shows that you don't think much of your friends who don't want to be called "girls." It shows a basic disrespect for the right of rational people to define themselves.

After changing your speech, you may start to realize the power words have. Our speech helps to perpetuate sexism, racism, heterosexism, classism—you name it. The homophobic slurs used by comedian Henry Cho, for example, don't just "offend" people. The words hurt many of the homosexuals in his audience. These are not weak, oversensitive people—they are people who are threatened by hate and violence, and need to fight back to hold their ground.

It seems to me that politically correct speech only sounds ridiculous when it is distorted by conservative descriptions. Some conservatives claim that p.c. speech is dividing campuses. I'd say sexual slurs are a lot more divisive than using a polite term like "woman." Some conservatives claim that we're going against free speech. I'd say that you shouldn't hide behind the First Amendment just to threaten someone. As long as women are being raped, homosexuals are being "bashed," and a million other crimes against humanity are happening, can you blame people for considering a slur to be a threat?

Colleges have been a hot arena for this issue, because in this setting we have a slightly better chance of improving our society. It is vital for threatened minorities to be free from verbal abuse in college, if we can't achieve this everywhere else. I am confident that administrations can find a good balance between free speech and confronting problems such as sexism.

Am I going to physically force you to use compassionate language? No. But if you use derogatory words, there are now many people who will stand up to you and ask you to stop, and that is a good thing. This is, very simply, an act of caring for other people.

And it is most certainly annoying at times. I have had my share of people interrupting me when I slip. But I welcome it. I consider how it would be more than annoying to have a slur thrown at me, an experience I'm lucky enough to not have had yet. Compassionate speech is, in the end, well worth the inconvenience.

It's too bad the entire world can't have a hall meeting, where we could work this all out. Until then, call people what they want to be called.

It is time to let PC rest in peace

BY WAYNE FERBERT

"How would you like to bite that on the ass, develop lock-jaw and be dragged to death." The aforementioned quote aptly describes the manner in which Bucknell has embraced the movements and issues commonly associated with political correctness. However, political correctness is finally singing its swan song at Bucknell. When the political correctness movement landed at Bucknell roughly a year and a half ago, it was already a cast away movement at the schools and universities "in the loop."

Why is political correctness dying (dead)? Mostly because it is an unembraceable movement. As a matter of fact, identifying political correctness as a movement is not even correct and serves to give it more credit than it is due. The term politically correct has come only to serve as a description of speech, issues, actions, or policies that have been altered because one interest group has taken offense. The offended group attempts to take the moral high ground usually claiming that the speech or policy "hurts our all too delicate feelings" or promotes stereotypes. Often times when a group seeks a policy change or action, it argues that the change would be a beneficial and pro-active step for all involved. The argument for a beneficial and pro-active change is often rooted in public sentiment or public policy. This latter justification has the most merit and tends to be the most effective.

If the liberal left would stop putting its foot in its mouth, or more appropriately, stop putting its foot in our mouth then the issue of political correctness... can be put to rest once and for all.

Each and every issue should be addressed individually and opinions sustained according to the merit of the arguments presented instead of any kind of carte blanche acceptance or denial of an issue because someone says it is politically correct or incorrect. One is no longer an individual when he or she begins to accept one side of an issue without investigating the other side just because a respected member of some group claims his/her side is politically correct. Unfortunately the net result of such politically correct groups is blind acceptance and divisiveness. Political correctness is almost a form of thought control. How ironic that political correctness should manifest itself so strongly on university grounds where an open exchange of views and ideas is supposed to be promoted and not suppressed.

Political correctness has been most prevalent among issues involving race, gender, ethnicity, and sexual orientation. Derogatory speech in conjunction with these issues has charged the politically correct fervor. Speech codes have been enforced on some campuses with a focus on hate speech. Some campuses such as the University of Nebraska have gone as far as to list words that may not be used in class lectures or campus circulars. Free speech is central to the exchange of ideas in an academic setting. Free speech should be promoted and not stilled. Hate speech, in my opinion, is deplorable but the Supreme Court recently upheld student's rights to free speech (specifically hate speech). The Supreme Court didn't qualify these rights with some sort of moral test but instead just said, in effect, "Have you read the constitution lately?" Interestingly enough, the liberal left rarely object to these campus 'gag orders' despite claiming to be ardent civil libertarians. The liberal

Pop culture's beat on rap music stereotypes

BY SAMANTHA SCHIVERS

Rap music is a mere manifestation of the hatred that continues to emanate from the black community because of acts committed against them well over twenty years ago.

It's uniformed statements like this made by, no doubt, uninformed people that perpetuate the hate inflicted upon African Americans twenty four hours a day, everyday. Saying that rap music is a vehicle for this hate is a misnomer. Rap music is, well, music. No, really? But an obvious statement like this has to be made. It seems that more and more, music has been confused with actual actions. A song about murder and pillaging is met with bulging eyes, gapping mouths, and such well thought out statements like "Oh, dear." But a book about murder and pillaging is likely to find itself on coffee tables all over America, proudly displayed for visitors.

Rap music has been stereotyped to death. (What hasn't?) Classic examples of young black hatred are cute little phrases like "get my 'ho" and "kill the bitches" by The Geto Boys and X-Clan's "Fuck the Police." Oh, just soak in the senseless implications of murder and disrespect. No doubt all rap artists feel this way, says the fat-gutted, cultural-elite-finger-pointer from his white middle class home.

Conveniently, from his arm chair, 'Mr. Average Citizen Watching the Nightly News With Much Appall' has been kept from the more positive side of rap music. I mean how many people really thought that all rap music was inflammatory and blasphemous? Hardly any. But, not many people may be aware of how popular some of these less hate oriented groups are. Public Enemy, for instance, extols the virtues of staying in school and following one's dreams on their album jacket. Unfortunately, this is of no interest to Dan Rather.

Rap music has been stereotyped. (Have I mentioned this before?) Not every rapper wears gold chains thicker than his/her neck. Big surprise. Not every rapper drives a Mercedes. Big surprise. Not every rapper hates white people. Big surprise. And not every African American is a rapper. Even bigger surprise. But when white people see an African American, they're most likely to be thinking (while moving a few steps in the opposite direction and placing a securing hand on their wallet), "Look at the black man over there without his chains or nose ring. What a surprise." Of course, now the white race is being stereotyped, but examples like this are necessary to show how ridiculous the mainstream perception of rap music and rap artists is.

All music genres have had such stigmas attached to them: heavy metal, Satanists; alternative, druggies; pop, big-haired mall walkers. I mean we have all been conditioned to respond in a knee-jerk kind of way toward everything. Someone mentions something and our mind immediately goes through all of the preconceived notions stored away. It's automatic.

But there's one major difference between heavy metal, alternative, pop, and rap. Our mind doesn't automatically group other races to a particular type of music. Every African American is somehow mystically linked to rap music in our white bread world, just as previously all African Americans were cosmically bonded to jazz. Our society has placed African Americans in a neat little niche in order to "properly" deal with them.

An entire race has been doomed to forever exist in only one type of music, one culture, one world: their own.

STREET BEAT: Which term is more appropriate, "freshman" or "first-year student"?

Why I Miss the Old 24 Hour Study Section

BY M. RYAN DURKIN

I figured it was time I congratulate the individual who decided to change the 24 hour study section of the library. The new Mac-lab/study closet is in a terrific location and illustrates an efficient, yet economical use of library space. It's also much more easily accessible through the fire door/entrance cleverly hidden among the landscaping bordering D.U.'s lawn. Another plus is that it's much less complicated than the old 24 hour section. You're immediately informed by an ear-piercing fire alarm if you accidentally go in or out the wrong door. This is a great wake up call for those people up late dozing off at a computer while trying to write a paper.

I do, however, have a few questions about this new improved 24 hour section. What did they put in the old 24 hour section? I walk by and gaze in every once in a while and can't seem to figure out what the hell it is. It looks like some sort of a super computer and I'd be willing to bet it has something to do with the engineering department. Regardless, whatever it is, it takes up too much space and Bucknell should have bought a smaller model of it. Another problem is how smokers are going to be able to deal with the new late night study chamber. Not many people relish the idea of stepping out into the brisk November air to enjoy a smooth Camel light. Yes, I know second hand smoke is bad for you, but I'd be willing to bet hypothermia is worse. And people will simply find new ways to get their recommended daily allowance of nicotine. Think of all the dip-cups that people are going to leave all over the place because they had to switch from butts. If you can't have mercy on the smokers, at least have mercy on the janitorial staff. I'd much rather empty Marlboro butts from ash trays than clean Copenhagen spit from a carpet. And I won't even mention the what dip or chew spit can do to a Macintosh keyboard.

We must also assess the implications the new 24 hour section has had on Bucknell's social scene. For many people, the 24 section was the hub of social activity on those "off nights". Where else could one spend 45 minutes studying and three hours shooting the breeze. It was the best place to meet new and interesting friends who happened to have notes you needed to copy the night before the exam. Now you have to spend hours searching the endless corridors of the library to find that "girl in the front row who always answers the questions and takes really good notes." And I can't begin to talk about the profound effect the new 24 hour section has had on the dating scene. For many people who, for one reason or another, are unable to communicate in the usual weekend social forums, the late night study lounge was the perfect place to meet "that special someone." It was common knowledge that the best place to lay rap was the old 24 hour section. I'd often shower, throw on some Brut, slip into my best black trousers and head for the Ellen Bertrand 24 hour section looking to meet Ms. Right. Now, however, I spend my time lonely, sulking in a study carousel in lower level two dreaming of those good old days.

left wants its cake and wants to eat it too. Many of the liberal left groups demand punishment for offensive speech but the groups are so sensitive about some ridiculous words or phrases that many students exercise self-censorship. On the other hand, conservatives on campus are enjoying the Madisonian high ground on this issue of free speech.

At Bucknell, the issue of speech currently surrounds the all-important 'freshman' versus 'first-year student' title. Apparently the word "man" has recently been discovered in the word freshman. How appalling!! Hang the bastards!! Wait a minute, bastard connotates an illegitimate child which may be offensive and is outlawed on University of Nebraska's campus. Good thing I'm not a cornhusker. If someone on this campus thinks he/she can take the moral high ground on this issue than he/she is spending way too much time deliberating on the issue and should probably re-focus his/her efforts to ensure that he/she will not be a first year student in his/her second year at Bucknell. I assume that the next step is to refer to juniors as third year students because the word junior may make third year students feel subordinate in some way.

Political correctness is not, however, limited to speech but also encompasses policies and actions. For instance, it has become politically correct for a university to promote and offer a wide variety of multicultural courses. Some schools are going as far as to make a multicultural course a requirement for freshmen. While this policy has become a very charged issue and is often described as a politically correct issue, its justification has very sound reason (or at least the reasoning is more sound). A campus uses alternate viewpoints as a method of instruction and multiculturalism has been accepted almost universally as a means by which to develop well rounded students. Diversity (a word which has begun to take on several meanings in the political spectrum lately) has always been a goal sought by administrators in the education field as a means of ensuring that a free flowing exchange of differing viewpoints is accomplished. The justifications for change that are a function of public sentiment or public policy are often the most effective.

Many organizations that embrace political correctness claim that the term "political correctness" is being used in an attempt to halt the move towards a more multicultural curriculum. The conservatives are also using political correctness to try to indict affirmative action programs. The liberal left is claiming that conservatives are truly guilty of the politics of divisiveness. These organizations that embrace political correctness are correct in their criticism that sometimes the conservatives use the issue of political correctness to their advantage but lets not forget who started political correctness to begin with. If the liberal left would stop putting its foot in its mouth, or more appropriately, stop putting its foot in our mouth then the issue of political correctness and resulting divisiveness can be put to rest once and for all. However, regardless of the liberal left's future political correctness stances, political correctness is an issue that is dead in the water. Rest In Peace.

The New Right is also the new intolerance

BY DAVE BARRY

This nation was founded upon the ideal of separation of church and state. Not because the founding fathers necessarily saw anything wrong with religion controlling the state. The majority of them believed that their own religion should control the state. The main problem was that there were too many religions. No one religion could stomach the idea that one religion would be the "state religion" so as a compromise there would be no state religion. Each individual religious sect would only be free to determine the morality of their area.

The pilgrims did not flee from religious persecution, but for the ability to persecute others. The state religions of Europe would not allow the Puritans to persecute their members who did not live up to their moral code. They fled to America to make sure that they could live in a "moral" world. It was important to make sure that husbands could not kiss their wives in public in Boston and that witches burned at the stake.

The Neo-right has succeeded in shifting America's focus back to olden days. Clinton was forced to show how he is a good family man. Hillary was pushed to the background and forced to bake cookies to show that she is a woman.

This country has had a history of intolerance. America was stuck in the thralls of religious ideals for most of its history. Many people have been hurt and the environment destroyed because this is what the Bible says. Finally something happened in the sixties and for the first time in America's history the religious right was badly defeated with the destruction of Barry Goldwater. People actually could wear short shorts in public. This could have been the destruction of the religious right but it did not happen.

They bided their time and in 1980 came back even more powerfully. This time the religious right was united for the first time. Catholic fundamentalists were in agreement with Born-again Christians. It was no longer a question of religious doctrine, but of the survival of a moral code that gave the churches their power. The new right realized that only by working together could they possibly save "their country". This would entail pushing back all the social and political gains of the sixties.

It was time to wage a war with anyone that disagreed with their political and cultural doctrine. Cardinal O'Conner threatens to excommunicate Governor Cuomo of New York while Pat Robertson makes a presidential bid to make sure that the Republicans do not go against Christian wishes. It is not a war along party lines. It is a war of ideologies. Governor Casey of Pennsylvania is a good Christian soul because of his pro-life so the Neo-Right will support him. George Bush because of his 1980 conversion to pro-life and his hatred of homosexuals must be a good Christian fellow and they supported him.

The Neo-right started their assault on the world of media and arts. The NEA was attacked for having the daring of promoting some controversial arts. The Neo-right wanted the destruction of the NEA even though over ninety percent of their budget supported the "classic" arts. The Last Temptation of Christ was banned and picketed in areas for trying to show that Jesus might have been a human being. It is all right to have your particular opinions but not to try to suppress those opinions. The Neo-right is afraid that any new idea might reflect badly upon themselves so they try to repress all new ideas. This country will not grow if new ideas cannot be discussed and questioned.

The 1992 election has supposedly taken the Neo-right out of power, but has it? Bill Clinton and Al Gore are pro-choice but they are also religious men who believe in the death penalty and a return to "values". The Neo-right has succeeded in shifting America's focus back to olden days. Clinton was forced to show how he is a good family man. Hillary was pushed to the background and forced to bake cookies to show that she is a woman. No one talks anymore about the ERA or the benefits of social programs. To do so would risk being called a "Liberal" or maybe even anti-American. America has been run one way for two hundred years and that is the way that it will stay. Some people were hoping that the nineties would be the successor to the sixties but that does not seem likely.

None of the candidates offered revolutionary ideas that will change the face of America's society. America no longer talks about emancipation of women and minorities. Oregon tries to pass a law banning homosexuality. Bigotry and hatred still flow throughout the lands. Rush Limbaugh and Pat Buchanan are still spewing out hatred. All that can be hoped for is that Americans sent a message to the "moral majority" in this election. The election of a Native American and an African American woman to the Senate hopefully signals a change. America will reject the past and create a society where everybody has a chance, not just good Christian souls.

Student assesses multiculturalism on campus

BY BRIAN ENG

When I visited the campus of Bucknell University last May, it seemed clear to me that this university could offer me more than any other of the seven schools I was to choose from. I had never, however, seriously thought about the issue of multicultural diversity. After all, I was an Asian student who had come from a Connecticut high school that consisted of no more than three people who were of the same ethnic background. I was accustomed to surviving in a community of fellow students that was not ethnically diverse, and being the ethnically unique individual in the crowd never bothered me; in fact, I somewhat enjoyed it. When I chose Bucknell as the choice for my college education, I naturally assumed that I would continue to feel the same way. I read the "three percent minority" statistic in one of those "big books of colleges," and I wasn't troubled by it at all.

As I anticipated, when I arrived for orientation in late August, I discovered that the statistic was, for the most part, true. Regardless of that fact, I began to blend in quite well, both socially and academically. My ethnic background was not a hindrance to me, and I never even gave it a second thought throughout the first couple of weeks. My adjustment to the university environment was fine.

Due to persistent begging and pleading from my parents to meet some people of my own ethnic background, I agreed to join what was then A. A. S. A., the Asian-American Student Organization. Therefore, my decision to join the organization was not, as some may think, based on my passionate desire to increase the level of multicultural diversity at this university.

This is essential; unless this campus gives multiculturalism an opportunity to flourish, the groups on campus that are making an effort to increase awareness are doing so in vain. They will remain separated from everyone else in this community of students, and the idea of "multicultural diversity" will continue to mean very little to the people of this university.

Then, roughly a week later, at one of the group's first meetings, I learned the genuine purpose for the organization on campus: it was to educate the campus in facets of multiculturalism and to make the students more multiculturally aware. This was questionable to me. As I mentioned, multiculturalism was never a major issue in my mind. All I was there for was to meet some new people. But some of the things that the group brought up during the meetings really turned my head. A large number of members stood up to say that they were unhappy with the state of ethnic diversity on campus. Then, something revolutionary happened. It started to bother me, too. I decided to find out more.

I went "undercover" for the next couple of weeks, observing this campus to see if the things I listened to at this meeting were true. I was somewhat surprised to find that they were all true. This campus is not at all diverse. This would not be such a disturbing fact if the students on this campus were making an effort to alleviate these problems, but they aren't. I began to believe that it was likely that the minority population on this campus would remain isolated for some time, unless the campus as a whole decided to do something about it.

Currently a member of the Asian-American student organization, now known as S. A. A. B. (Students for Asian-American Awareness at Bucknell), I attend meetings frequently, usually once or twice a week. Through these meetings, I have learned a great deal about all the ethnic and international clubs on campus, as well as the lack of multicultural diversity on campus. These clubs, which include N. A. A. C. P., P. I. A. (Pakistan-India Association), Cumbre (Hispanic-American club), among others, are a healthy start to increase multicultural awareness.

However, having these groups are only half the battle. There is still a large obstacle that all of these organizations must overcome before beginning to think about increasing multicultural awareness on this campus. Every one of these organizations has an extensive agenda of activities and multicultural events, but are having a great deal of trouble executing them, and even when they carry out their plans, the campus as a whole is not aware of them. If the campus is naive about these events, then the organizations carrying out these events are not helping to increase multicultural awareness. They are, in fact, separating themselves from the rest of the campus. They are doing so because they are organizing events and activities that the rest of the campus aren't attending. Sometimes, the events which are held are only attended by the members of the organization which arranges it. This does nothing to increase multicultural awareness. What is does is it creates a situation where the members of the particular ethnic group only associate with one another, thus isolating them from the rest of the campus.

So, is there a solution to all of this? All the minority organizations must first interact with each other, and try to work together to make this campus more aware of their presence. Minority ethnic groups should be proud of their heritage, but not separate themselves from the rest of the campus. When the multicultural groups, as well as the rest of the campus, become aware of this, the problems of diversity at this school will have hope of being solved.

The problems of multicultural diversity today are not solely due to the actions of the minority ethnic clubs or the reactions of the rest of the campus. We can be well on our way to a desirable level of multicultural diversity only if the minority groups increase their efforts and if the campus as a whole is receptive to their efforts. At this moment, groups around campus are planning a variety of events, including trips to New York City and an endless number of conferences. However, the groups should attempt to plan more events that are open to and are of interest to the entire campus. Once organized, these plans for events have to be carried out. Hopefully, events such as these will be well attended and will benefit this campus and will contribute to the ideals of multiculturalism. This is essential; unless this campus gives multiculturalism an opportunity to flourish, the groups on campus that are making an effort to increase awareness are doing so in vain. They will remain separated from everyone else in this community of students, and the idea of "multicultural diversity" will continue to mean very little to the people of this university.

The meat market has serious consequences

BY JACINTA BUNNELL

Herbivores ate well because their food didn't ever run. What does it mean to make a vow to never again eat the flesh of a once-living being? What are the implications, both ethically and environmentally of a vegetarian diet?

The expanding dependency that Americans have developed in recent years for meat and other animal products has caused a nation-wide "factory farm" epidemic in the United States. These animal farms are not the roam-free-on-the-range type farms that we see in children's books and commercials. These farms are actually industrial factories where animals are "produced" with an assembly line approach to farming. Factory farms are urgent cries for moral change because of both the cruelty and unsanitary conditions that are found behind closed doors.

Within the confined corridors of the factory farms, the scenes are reminiscent of slavery. The animals are deprived of any and all normal social contact, contained in isolated cubicles or cramped quarters. Chickens, for example, are allotted a living area approximately the size of a sheet of office paper for the duration of their lives. Forced to live in a small space with thousands of other chickens, our fine-feathered friends often peck each other to death or resort to cannibalism because of mental strain. Ah, but never fear, Mr. Farmer has a simple solution to that. He just whips out his miniature version of the guillotine and chops all their little beaks off. Not exactly a painless solution.

These animal farms are not the roam-free-on-the-range type farms that we see in children's books and commercials. These farms are actually industrial factories where animals are "produced" with an assembly line approach to farming.

The majority of the animals which are raised for food never see the light of day, a grueling condition for animals who are instinctually free to run in the sunlight. And how about the thought of eating your own defecation? Not exactly gourmet. But this is a daily meal for the cows, chickens, and pigs of the factory farms because it is a rare occasion when the floors are cleaned.

Interested in the environment? Well, let me offer you one simple solution that will enable you to feel as if you are doing your part to save the Earth. . . Stop eating the flesh of animals! Millions of acres of forest are destroyed each year for cattle-grazing. Fertile lands are being transformed into deserts because of over-grazing and over-irrigation to supply water to livestock. Half of all the water consumed in the U.S. is used in livestock production, mostly to water all the crops needed to feed the animals. About 2500 gallons of water goes into making just one pound of beef alone!

The water pollution caused by U.S. factory farming, in terms of pesticides, manure, and soil run-off is greater than all municipal and industrial sources combined. Interested in "Saving the Bay"? Well, the most effective action you could take to make a difference is to limit or stop your consumption of flesh. The largest polluter of the Chesapeake Bay is the excess of nutrients from farm runoff, causing both nitrogen and phosphorous pollution.

How about feeding the world? Maybe that strikes a chord. Well, I can offer you a solution to that also. Once again, all we need to do is limit our intake of animal flesh. Half of United States agricultural output every year goes to the production of livestock. Farm animals consume 90% of the soy grown in the U.S., and 80% of the corn. Imagine how many starving and malnourished people could be fed if even half of that were relegated to the impoverished of our country and to the Third World countries.

So, if all these factors add up and show us that reducing our production of meat would be beneficial to the whole Earth and all sentient creatures, why are we still living the "meat and potatoes myth"? Is it the tradition of dominance that has caused humans to feel that they have an a priori right to rule over animals? Is it a case of misinformation perhaps caused by the monopoly the meat and dairy industry have over the commercialization of food? Whatever it may be, I challenge you to break the vicious cycle, educate yourself, and stand up against the powers that dominate your misguided eating habits.

It is time we started thinking about what those fine little packages of meat, looking so neat and trim and void of all traces of blood, once were. It is time you admit that what is on your plate was once a living, breathing creature. It is time to start eating food that didn't ever run. Like your mom always said, eat your vegetables.

For more in-depth discussions of the implications and benefits of going vegetarian, my advise is to do some reading. There are tons of great books available. Just to name a few of the classics, Diet for a New America by John Robbins, Diet for a Small Planet by Frances Moore Lappe, and Animal Liberation by Peter Singer.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Student questions review of The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs

TO THE EDITOR:

As an avid theater goer here on campus, and as someone who attended "The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs", I would like to respond to Professor Marilyn Mumford's review of this play. This review was a gross misinterpretation of the performance.

Professor Mumford initially states that "the company achieved an almost professional production of a difficult play." On the contrary, the play was exceptionally professional, of at least off-Broadway quality in all aspects—lighting, sound, set and costume design, and in particular acting.

I strongly disagree with her comments regarding the portrayal of the two lead characters—Albert Nobbs by Valerie K. Marsden and Hubert Page by Mary Jordan. Marsden gave the most profound performance of all the characters. As she was presented with by far the most difficult role, she depicted it realistically and performed it flawlessly; and with as much ease as if she were Albert Nobbs, a woman portraying a man, all her life.

Mumford feels that this play is about "women who fall in love with, are romantically attracted to, other women." Not necessarily. Gary Grant directed the play in a most outstanding way. He choose not solely a feminist or homosexual viewpoint (that the lead women in the play are lesbians), nor solely a logistical or conservative viewpoint (that the women dress as men or live together because of practicality).

Rather, Professor Grant, keeping in mind his audience, made a conscious, non-compromising decision to take a middle-of-the-road stance. He left it up to the audience to decide whether these women were involved in homosexual or practical relationships.

It was Grant's choice to consciously avoid the "sting," as Mumford states, of lesbian relationships. The actors in following the director's interpretation of the play, must not be criticized when he chooses not to portray the characters in a particular light.

Albert Nobbs is not necessarily a woman who is attracted to other women, as Mumford believes. Any homosexual innuendos perceived by the audience are secondary and not the primary goal of the paly, due to Grant's decision. Perhaps that is a reason why Mumford feels the emotional tension that she was looking for was not present in the quantity she felt necessary.

Both Marsden and Jordan were dynamic and convincing in their performances. "The Singular Life of Albert Nobbs" was by far the best University Theatre production I've seen in the three and a half years I've attended Bucknell.

tion, protectionism, corrupt moral and family values, and diminished global respect, America will have finally had enough. Clintonism will force the conservative movement to regroup and re-focus. 1996 shall witness the election of a truly principled Republican. Just like in 1976, when Carter submerged America into a quagmire of economic instability and international indecisiveness, we will once again witness first hand that government is a behemoth, incapable to effectively serve the people.

Fortunately, in four years we will be saved by a President with stronger convictions than George Bush—one who strives to control government, reduce taxes, strengthen the military, and restore our international economic dominance. In the mean time however, the country must support Clinton's plans to control the burgeoning federal deficit, so long as they do not force America to become a military non-entity. With a prudent application of monetary policy, term limitations, reductions in entitlements and tort laws, and the adoption of innovative programs like school choice, America's woes can be solved. But without these proposals that Clinton has so far refused to endorse, America's future will only change for the worse.

Eating with more than hunger in mind

Vegetarians and vegans unite to eat their way into a healthier, more humane world

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Many feel that vegetarian eating has long been a health advantage. Fact is, vegetarians as a group have lower blood pressure than meat-eaters. But why would one decide to become a vegetarian? Are these benefits really worth the change of lifestyle which accompanies vegetarian eating? And are these the only benefits?

In addition to improved physical health, however, most vegetarians do have other reasons for not eating meat. Issues surrounding animal rights and the less-than-ethical treatment of animals in our nation's food production industry may even be the most significant reason why people begin a vegetarian diet.

"I first became a vegetarian after reading the book published by PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) and I decided to stop eating meat," remarked Carolyn Haller, '96. "I don't believe in eating animals at all, and it's a protest against the harsh treatment of animals which are raised for slaughter."

Today, most animals raised for food are crowded into pens and cages and fed large amounts of antibiotics to counter the diseases that run rampant under these conditions. They are often subjected to cruel practices, i.e. the beaks of hens are painfully cut off with hot irons so that they won't peck each other to death in their close confinements.

Environmental concerns also play a large role in one's decision to become a vegetarian. Forests throughout the world are destroyed in order to make room for cattle grazing, which eventually yields to soil erosion, a dearth of natural habitat for indigenous animals, and less oxygen due to less oxygen-producing trees. Much of the rainforest destruction is engendered by the need for grazing land. Between 1960 and 1985, 40% of all Central American rainforests were destroyed to create pasture for beef cattle.

"I became a vegetarian for mostly political reasons," noted Lari Bishop '94. "There is so much degredation caused by deforestation that I felt that it was almost my responsiblitiy to stop eating meat."

The issue of human starvation is also a factor in many people's decision. It takes 16 pounds of grain to produce a pound of beef. And the U.S. livestock population consumes enough grain and soybeans each year to feed more than five times the entire U.S. population: 1.3 billion people. Reducing the amount of meat one eats by about 10% would mean 12 million more tons of grain to feed humans—enough to feed each of the 60 million people who starve to death each year.

Those who do decide upon vegetarianism as a way of life, maintain that their life has changed in some ways. "Eating is a ritual, and when you change what you eat, you change that ritual," said Joel Wainwright '95. "Becoming a vegetarian has made me slow down a lot and think more about what I eat and what I do. I have a lot more energy now than I ever did, and I feel a lot healthier."

As a rule, our society does not provide as much meal diversity for vegetarians. There are health-food stores and restaurants which cater to vegetarian eating, but often people are forced to shop for food in stores located a further distance from their homes, simply because supermarkets don't carry many soybean products or "meatless" meat.

"I often shop at Walden Acres because they carry soy milk and dairy products," continued Wainwright. "But I call veganism (strict vegetarianism) a privileged decision because the food is more expensive then regular food. On the other hand, giving up only meat is actually cheaper when you compare the cost of broccoli to a steak. And broccoli has just as much protein as the steak."

Especially at Bucknell, a vegetarian with a meal plan is relegated to the salad bar in the cafe, or simply becomes intimate with the flavor nuances of the vegetarian lasagna. For first-year students this can be particularly difficult.

Comments Ken Urban '96,"I was incredibly disappointed with the food in the cafe. In all the literature that was sent to me before I arrived at Bucknell I got the impression that vegetarians were actually quite common here, and that there would be a good selection of food to choose from. That definitely isn't the case, and although I'm better able to cope with the situation now, I was very hungry for the first week of school."

It seems that not eating those foods which are touted as "good for you" does not affect vegetarians. "I read a lot of books about nutrition when I started three years ago," commented lacto-ovo vegetarian Haller. "And I believe that I'm eating a lot more nutritiously now than I was before I gave up meat. I don't ever consider going back and eating meat."

Wainwright added that he would also never go back on meat,"Veganism has such a small support group, and I do end up eating some dairy products out of necessity, but I always know where my heart is. And I've made a conscious decision to say that this is important to me."

Common types of vegetarianism

Pure or strict vegetarian diet (also known as vegan): Excludes all foods of animal origin—meat, poultry, fish, eggs, and all dairy products.

Lacto-ovo vegetarian diet: Excludes meat, poultry, and fish, but includes eggs and dairy products of various types.

The dark side of a cultural obsession

BY JENN COOK

At one time or another, we've all seen one of those afternoon TV specials that preach the evils of crash-dieting and resorting to extreme weight-loss measures. The scene is vividly set in a cramped bathroom. A petite blond is applying another layer of high gloss lip shine and laughing at her not-so-petite friend. "Got the urge to purge, Bessy?" she laughs. But is it all that funny?

Anorexia nervosa, bulimia nervosa and compulsive overeating are three types of eating disorders that plague college campuses and are no laughing matter. As many as 1 in 100 females between 12 and 18 years of age develop anorexia, and by their first year of college, 4.5 to 18 percent of women and .4 percent of men have a history of bulimia.

Anorexics are usually thin to the point of emaciation and are afraid to gain weight. General symptoms of this weight disorder are dry skin and hair, cold hands and feet, general weakness, constipation and digestive problems, insomnia, and amenorrhea (loss of menstrual periods).

Bulimics, however, are typically of average or slightly above average weight. A bulimic will go on an eating binge, only to purge afterwards by self-induced vomiting, abusing laxatives and diuretics, or fasting or over-exercising in order to lose the gained weight. This eating disorder causes medical problems such as dehydration, constipation and digestive disorders, severe dental problems and weakness.

Compulsive overeaters are commonly overweight and may become obese. With weight increase, they may begin to suffer from shortness of breath, high blood pressure, or joint problems. In extreme cases, this disorder can cause heart and gall bladder disease and diabetes.

Experts hypothesize that a cause of these eating disorders may be the belief that in America, thinner is better. Some young women feel abnormally pressured to be as thin as the "ideal" portrayed by magazines, movies and television.

College campuses are the prime areas affected by anorexia, bulimia, and overeating. Because so many students (mostly female) are obsessed with fitting in and looking like their thinner counterparts, they resort to desperate measures to maintain what they think is the ideal weight. Preoccupation with appearance and body image, and the cultural obsession with obesity and weight control deeply affect the people that suffer from these disorders.

Some female students try a "reasoning" method to explain why they either do not eat or overeat and purge. For example, if a student spent the weekend partying and drinking alcohol, she may decide to only eat salad for a week to even out the amount of weight she gained over the weekend.

Other students who are experiencing severe stress may overeat as a form of release, then purge to rid themselves of the extra food.

Sporadic eating habits, alcohol, stress and obsession with appearance are all factors that affect a student's self-image and could lead to a detrimental eating disorder. If you have an eating disorder, or want to help someone who does, contact Student Health Services.

The Farmer's Market: A haven for health

Tired of the same food day after day, week after week? Does the thought of eating in the cafeteria or the Bison make your cholesterol level cringe? Do you want to eat something that could actually be in one of the five basic food groups? Though you won't find the Bart Butterfinger group, the Farmer's Market off Route 45 offers just about every wholesome fruit, vegetable, meat and in between for anyone looking for a nutritious alternative to the same cafe catastrophies.

Specializing in fresh, home-grown fruits and vegetables, the Farmer's Market is a change of pace for the average malnourished college student. Kristy Schiano '95, a frequent customer of the Farmer's Market, said "The food is great and cheap—it's perfect for a college budget."

Vegetarians also appreciate the variety and quality of foods offered at the Farmer's Market. "The food you find there is cheaper and more organically grown than what you would find at the grocery store," said Jocelyn Perot '94, a vegetarian. Perot said that vegetarians often cannot find alternative items to supplement protein into their diets, but the Farmer's Market offers a large selection of dried beans, cheeses, breads, homemade pasta and fresh herbs to offset the lack of vitamins, minerals and proteins.

As the seasons change, the selection at the Farmer's Market changes. If a certain item is not in season, and vendors at the market no longer carry it, the item can be special ordered.

So, if you are in the mood for something different at your next meal and the thought of pizza makes you nauseous, wake up your taste buds at the Farmer's Market.

What the health is going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Lately there has been a cholesterol mania. Everyone talks about it: doctors, the media and students. Yet, there are many misconceptions about what cholesterol is, what cholesterol numbers are, and what foods are high in cholesterol.

Cholesterol, located in all body cells, is a soft molecule made of fat. It comes from two sources: your body and foods made from animals. Your body creates 80% of your total cholesterol in the liver and uses it for cell membranes, hormones, and other bodily tissues. The fat sources from animals are: egg yolks, organ meats, fatty meats, and whole milk dairy products. Cholesterol is necessary for bodily functions, so small amounts of it are beneficial for you. It is when you eat too much of it that problems occur.

Cholesterol is one of the four main fats: saturated, polysaturated, monounsaturated and cholesterol. The first three are fatty acids and cholesterol is a fat-like substance. Of the fatty acids, only saturated fats raise blood cholesterol and polyunsaturated fatty acids lower blood cholesterol.

Cholesterol travels from cell to cell through the bloodstream by special carriers called lipoproteins since fat can not dissolve in blood. There are two lipoproteins that are important to discuss. The first one is the low density lipoprotein which is very dangerous for the body. Most of the LDL circulate in the bloodstream and slowly build up on the inner walls of the arteries, which are attached to the heart and feed blood to the heart. This cholesterol and other substances create plaque, a thick, hard coating that clogs arteries in the heart. This procedure, atherosclerosis, can lead to a heart attack or stroke. It has never been proven that cholesterol directly causes atherosclerosis, but it is highly likely.

The second category of lipoproteins is the high-density lipoprotein which carries 1/4 to 1/3 of blood cholesterol. HDL is produced by the liver and some doctors believe that HDL tends to carry cholesterol away from the arteries and back to the liver. Others think that HDL removes excess cholesterol from the plaque build-up and thus lowers the risk of heart attacks or strokes. But, a low level of HDL has negative effects as well.

Starting at age twenty, it is important to check your cholesterol levels about every five years. When a physician measures your cholesterol levels in your blood, s/he can also measure the amounts of HDL and blood fat or triglycerides to calculate your amount of LDL. These together measure your risk of atherosclerosis. A high triglyceride level means higher total cholesterol and LDL-cholesterol level, and a lower HDL-cholesterol.

Using the total blood cholesterol account, American men usually consume 450 milligrams of cholesterol a day and women around 320. The American Heart Association recommends a daily intake of cholesterol below 300 mg. You can do this by eating low-fat foods such as fruits, vegetables, whole grains, lean and skinless meats, and low-fat or skim milk. Also, in the future watch for the synthetic fats, Olestra and Simplese, that taste, feel, and act like real fats. They might have a significant impact on the health of Americans.

If you have any questions about cholesterol, call Jan Baylor at Student Health Services.

Blood cholesterol falls into these categories:

Less than 200 mg/dl	Desirable
200 to 239 mg/dl	Borderline High
240 mg/dl and over	High

LDL-Cholesterol Level falls into these categories:

Below 130 mg/dl	Desirable
Between 130-160 mg/dl	Borderline High
Over 160 mg/dl	High

HDL-Cholesterol Level falls into these categories:

Average man	40-50 mg/dl
Average woman	50-60 mg/dl
Abnormally low	Less than 35 mg/dl

Mystery calories add up

BY CARISSA ITLE

Drop that slice of pizza and take a look at this week's menu. Those little numbers that appear next to the food items are almost as big a mystery as what makes "supreme sauce" supreme.

So what do those numbers represent? The first number is the calorie content of one serving, followed by the grams of fat in the food item. What does this mean to your typical Bucknellian? It means that with every Bison burger you inhale, you are getting a bonus of 550 calories and 26 grams of fat.

If you'd rather have the lighter dish of tuna fish, the calorie count drops to 173 with 16 grams of fat. Or what about the ultimate fast snack, bagels? A plain bagel, sans cream cheese or butter, is 150 calories and a mere 2 grams of fat.

Those lovely little side snacks like french fries (126 calories), potato chips (160 calories) and nachos with cheese (173 calories) make even the most guilt free eater a bit wary of the evils of late-night snacking.

The average diet is about 2000 calories a day, or 12 and a half servings of potato chips or about 3 and a half Bison burgers. So the next time you read the caf menu, before relishing in the sheer delight of seeing your favorite dish, remember that there is some use for the mystery numbers that are beside them.

The great dilemma: where to eat today?

BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As your cold, weary body stumbles from bed or that 11 o'clock class towards the LC, thoughts of mom's home-cooking dance in your head. The doors of the LC fly open and reality hits. Lunch a la mom is out of the question and the options you have are three: The Bison, the Caf, or the Terrace Room. So which one is it going to be?

The Bison

The new and improved Bison, opened in November of 1990, is the latest addition to the food franchise at Bucknell. Offering a range of food from salads to sandwiches and the unique Bison Breakfast, the Bison provides a breakfast, lunch and dinner alternative for any hungry Bucknellian. The problems from eating in the Bison arise when questions of health and wealth are at hand, though.

When one is forced to extract one's wallet from one's pocket day after day when the bill of fare is a tad more than expected, the pleasure of eating in the Bison soon diminishes. The price of convenience for items in the convenient store, a handy adaptation to the express-mart, are on the average ten to twenty cents higher than those in a regular grocery store. A full meal from the Bison is also a bit pricey. For the healthy appetite, a turkey club sandwich at $3.25, a side of cajun fries for $1.25, a medium yogurt for dessert at $1.48, and a medium soft drink for $.70 to wash it all down adds up to an even healthier $6.70. For the few Bucknellians who know the value of money, eating in the Bison adds up, and at those prices, one might find it cheaper, though not easier, to cook for oneself.

Deb Hildebrandt—The Bucknellian

Students gather around tables in the caf to take part in a campus dining experience. The caf offers variety, as well as mystery.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Jean Jerz '95 serves Buffy Ayres '93 in the Bison. Eating in the Bison can be an expensive but, sometimes needed break from caf food.

If money is not the concern when eating at the Bison, health certainly should be. It is easy to get caught in the habit of eating those temptingly terrible delights like the Bison Breakfast. Your arteries should be screaming for mercy at the sight of eggs, cheese and bacon in one forbidden sandwich. If grease is a problem, stick to sandwiches and salads because almost everything else is a veritable smorgasbord of fat, grease, cholesterol and all the other evil words in the health dictionary. If you can trust yourself to eat more bagels and salads and less cheesesteaks and Bison burgers, eating wisely and staying healthy should not be a problem.

Overall, the Bison is a good place to treat yourself to now and then, especially if you need a quick food fix. The menu, which hasn't changed much since the Bison opened, does get old after a few meals and isn't necessarily a treat for the bank account or body.

The caf

The Roy Grier Bostwick Memorial Cafeteria is the place where many students choose to dine. Offering a menu that repeats every four weeks, the caf has the most diverse menu of all options available on campus. The caf is sure to provide some kind of meal for even the pickiest eater with one and sometimes two entrees available. There is also host of cereals, a salad bar, and fixings for PB and J's or tuna fish sandwiches. For the hungry Bucknellian, second or third helpings are welcomed. A meal plan even cuts out the financial woes that eating in the Bison or off campus can cause.

The caf, however, is not without its faults. Figuring out the mystery meat of the day can be an eye-opening and stomach turning experience. Flavor is not always an option when eating in the caf and things that go crunch in mashed potatoes are not worth questioning.

The taste variable often seems low on the totem pole of priorities, but there are a few sacred meals in the caf that students like. Chicken burgers, grilled cheese sandwiches, vegetarian and meat lasagna are just a few menu items that bring a smile to a student's face.

For the early riser who actually makes it to the caf in time, breakfast is usually a bearable eating experience. Homemade doughnuts, cereals, muffins and biscuits are a few accessories to the entrees of breakfast. The main course, however, is usually not the greatest way to start a day. Aside from the Sunday Eggs Benedict, breakfast entrees usually have that just-out-of-the-freezer taste.

For the most part, the caf experience is a livable one. Mass feedings for hundreds of hungry Bucknellians can't substitute a tantalizing dinner for two at the Ritz; but what other school offers lobster or filet mignon at their Christmas dinner? The caf's applaudable effort of feeding Bucknellians is a success so far and no one has died from it yet.

The Terrace Room

Ahh, the Terrace Room. That aesthetically pleasing place to eat, socialize and be merry. Where else can you go for lettuce that isn't brown, real sliced deli meat, fresh bread and soup? And who could pass up the ambiance of the Terrace Room? With music piped into the eatery and huge glass windows enclosing the whole little Terrace Room world. Why eat anywhere else?

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

Despite lacking variety, the Terrace Room is a prime spot for the health conscious.

The Terrace Room is open five days a week during lunch and on some evenings for students to graze as they please. Health and nutrition are top of the line here. A fully stocked salad bar and an equally plentiful sandwich bar are the main courses offered in this euphoria of good food. A variety of fresh fruits are always available and a yogurt machine serving low- and non-fat yogurt is now on tap.

What could be wrong with a nutritious haven like this? Variety. After two or three days of salads and sandwiches, the Bison eating syndrome sets in and the average eater may begin to wonder if there is more to life than lettuce and turkey. For the not-so-average, weight-watching, lettuce-loving student, though, the Terrace Room is heaven on earth. The best way to take advantage of such a vital resource like Terrace Room is to go once or twice a week to insure a healthy diet with a little variety.

Wherever the hungry Bucknellian chooses to eat on or off campus, there are, despite many complaints, alternative feeding holes to please the palate.

Crunchy foods for crunchy people

If you're hungry and you want something a little unusual, the Natural Food and Garden Store may be the place for you. The store offers various kinds of natural and organically grown foods in addition to other health- conscious products.

Owner Chris Snyder and his wife, Kate Lesslie, opened the store in March of 1980. "Having grown up in the 60s, I wanted to sell the kinds of things I believed in," said Snyder. "I wanted to make vegetarian and other foods available to myself and others."

Originally, the store just sold natural and whole grain foods. Since then, the interest in natural foods has grown, and Snyder has modified his stock to reflect that change. "Oat bran really opened the door to a lot of people who got interested in natural foods," Snyder said. "It was the first time a lot of people made the connection between food and health. Sometimes you can use diet to affect your health instead of drugs."

Snyder sells vitamins and sports supplements, as well as snacks, pastas, herbal teas and coffees. "We sell a lot of snacks to students," Snyder said. He has begun to stock more fat-free foods in response to the demand of students and local residents. The store also features other ecologically friendly items, such as organic gardening supplies and cleaning products that will not harm the earth.

The prices for some items, such as nuts, are significantly lower in the Natural Food and Garden Store than they would be elsewhere. Some of the more substantial choices are more expensive, however, due to their higher quality.

The Natural Food and Garden Store is located on the right-hand side of Route 45 West 1.5 miles from Lewisburg.

Have you ever wondered . . . . . who decides the caf menu?

BY CARYN AKELAITIS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever noticed the trend in the cafeteria menu? Or wondered who decides that Tuesday is chicken nugget night and Friday is grilled cheese and tomato soup day?

The production manager, chef, and Director of Dining Services, Henry Ross, is responsible for determining the menu. "The menu repeats itself every four weeks," stated Ross. "We have reduced the menu to the more popular items and eliminated things such as liver and meatloaf that were not very popular."

Student suggestions are very important to the cafeteria staff and the suggestion box located at the entrance of the caf is just one way of getting student input. Responses to suggestions, comments and questions submitted to the cafeteria are posted outside the main entrance. "We are aware of the students' nutritional needs as well as their likes and dislikes," said Ross. "Their suggestions are very important. The cafeteria is not profit driven; it is here to provide the best food for the least amount of cost. We are always looking for new recipes."

Future plans for the cafeteria are in the making, including more food options, longer breakfast hours, changing the Terrace Room into a food court area, and a possible remodeling of the dining room.

Impressions of an artist: Everett Warner

The Center Gallery opens its newest exhibit by Everett Warner, American impressionist, on Saturday, November 14

BY NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Thomas Warner, professor of music emeritus, remembers his father Everett as "an eminently practical man, not fitting the image of the artist as a scatterbrained recluse. Father also had a marvellous sense of humor and could see the irony of situations. He once mowed our lawn during one of Mother's bridge parties dressed in a tuxedo, complete with cummerbund, because she had complained of his paint-stained khaki shirt and trousers."

But Everett Warner's works tell a different story. Fitting into the school of American impressionists, Warner depicts mostly country and urban landscapes, often focusing on the humorless reality of Pittsburgh and New York.

A retrospective exhibit of Warner's works opens at the Center Gallery on Saturday, November 14. Warner's two surviving sons, Thomas and James, will present a gallery talk about their impressions of their father at 4:30 during the opening reception.

Warner was born in Vinton, Iowa in 1877. After studying art in Washington, D.C, he enrolled at the renowned Academie Julian in Paris where he spent several years both in the academy and travelling through Yugoslavia, Italy, Germany, and Spain.

In 1909 Warner became a member of the artists' colony at Old Lyme, CT. There he and other American impressioninsts such as Childe Hassam boarded at the stately mansion of Florence Griswold. A longtime fixture at the art colony, Warner painted a panel in the celebrated dining room of the Griswold mansion.

Much of Warner's reputation as an American impressionist stems from his landscapes of the Old Lyme countryside, and later from his city views portraying the bustling markets, wharves, and street life of lower Manhattan.

Recognized early for his talents, Warner received such prestigious awards as the Sesnan Gold Medal of the Pennsylvania of Fine Arts, the Buenos Aires International Exposition Silver Medal, and the Second Hallgarten Prize of the National Academy of Design.

Warner remained in Old Lyme until the beginning of World War I when he joined the Navy Department to be in charge of creating camouflage designs for ships. Warner would later return to the Navy to serve during World War II.

In 1924 Warner became a professor of art at the Carnegie Institute of Technology in Pittsburgh, a position he held until 1942. It was during this period that Warner's direction focused on some of the harsher social scenes of his time. His works portraying the Pittsburgh steel mills, tenement houses, and the city's railroad trains won exhibition prizes at the New York World's Fair and the National Academy of Design.

"The Guardian Elm" (upper left) and "The Municipal Building" (upper right)are two of Everett Warner's works on display. Warner, who lived part of his life in New York City, often turned the scenes from his everyday life into paintings. Warner (lower) working on Florence Griswold's dock on the Lieutenant River in Old Lyme, CT. Warner worked in Old Lyme for several years and based many of his pieces from the surrounding landscapes.

Warner later moved to a rural community in southern New Hampshire, working there until his death in 1963.

The showing in the Center Gallery represents the third and final showcase in an exhibition tour that started at the Florence Griswold Musuem in Old Lyme, CT and travelled to the Westmoreland Museum of Art in Greensburg, PA before coming here.

The exhibit grew from James Warner's interest in having an exhibition of his father's work.

Over the past two years Helen K. Fusscas, the 1950's, but displays many of his preliminary sketches, etchings, and even tools that Warner made and used for his work.

Warner's subject matter is "representational"—it shows things that are easily recognizable. He tended to paint everyday scenes. Among his favorite subjects were Peck Slip, a wharf in New York City, and the First Congregational Church of Old Lyme.

A cursory glance at the exhibit looks like a panorama of winter scenes. In fact Warner's chief interests in art were the play of light on snow and smoke, and the juxtaposition of geometric shapes so that many of his paintings are either snowy New England landscapes or smoky urban cityscapes.

However, despite the social commentaries that critics tended to read in Warner's paintings, Warner always maintained the social context was secondary to his fascination with light and shapes.

"Progress and Poverty #1," for example, is a brutally realistic painting of a shanty house framed by the omniscent smokestacks of the Pennsylvania steel mills. The title, taken from a Henry George essay about social and economic problems, combined with the dark and oppressive feeling of the painting, caused critics to place the piece in the realm of social realism. Warner refuted, saying his main objective for the painting was "the contrast between the vertical and horizontal lines of the mills against the curved lines of the ground and smoke masses and color contrasts."

Also included in the exhibit are previously unviewed pieces such as "Battery Park." This painting of the New York landmark presents Warner's fascination with city streets dotted with historical homes, towered over by contemporary skyscrapers.

Warner never showed the piece. Instead he placed it in a frame he carved and kept it until his death. Done in pastel oils, the painting is a cheery contrast to some of his more depressing scenes.

One of the foremost American impressionists, Warner's works are housed in such museums as the Art Institute of Chicago, the Toledo Museum of Art, the Museum of the City of New York, and the New York Historical Society. Many of the pieces for the exhibit were also donated by members of the Warner family.

With day scenes that are reminiscent of Turner and night scenes that presuppose Edward Hopper, Warner's display is a potpourri of artistic styles and mediums that remains one of the finest exhibits the Center Gallery has housed.

The Center Gallery is open from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m. weekdays and 1 to 4 p.m. weekends. Admission is free.

guest curator to the Florence Griswold Museum, has traveled the country tracking down previously unlocated paintings and pursuing research leads in her effort to assess Warner's work. This exhibit represents the culmination of her research.

Much of the background information for the exhibit was provided by Thomas Warner, who preserved many of his father's letters, photographs, writings, and memorabilia. In addition Fusscas interviewed numerous people who personally knew Warner. Fusscas authored a book titled A World Observed to accompany the exhibit. Copies are available through the Center Gallery.

Containing over 70 pieces of Warner's work, the exhibit provides a complete overview of the artist's diverse talents. It includes not only a broad cross section of his paintings, spanning his career from the 1890's through

Week-long residency ends with concert

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

For weeks, you've read about it in "What's Happening"—"The Hilliard are coming!" You've seen the posters hanging around campus, and each time, you've asked yourself, "Who are the Hilliard?" Well ask no more, because they are here.

The Hilliard Ensemble is a British a cappella group that performs music of the past millenium. The ensemble was founded in 1974 as a group of four friends who simply enjoyed performing together. The present Hilliard Ensemble has been together for two years and consists of baritone Gordon Jones, countertenor David James, and tenors John Potter and Roger Covey-Crump.

For the past week, members of the ensemble have been in residence on the Bucknell Campus. This residency will come to a close when they perform tonight in the Weis Center for Performing Arts.

According to Potter, the reputation of the Hilliard ensemble is chiefly that of an early music group. However in the last five years the contemporary side of the group has developed dramatically. Evidence of that development will be seen in tonight's concert, which will feature music of the past five hundred years from twelve different countries.

"All of the pieces we will be performing are linked in some way, which we invite the audience to work out for themselves," said James. "There is something for everybody in our program."

The Hilliard Ensemble has been incredibly active during their residency. After performing for a small group in Bucknell Hall on Wednesday afternoon, the ensemble held a master class on Thursday. Several Bucknell vocal students performed during the class, which was open to the public.

The group members also attended several classes in the music department in between meandering about the Bucknell campus (which they all find to have a relaxed, pleasant atmosphere), and giving workshops.

Following this residency, the ensemble will be returning to England to begin working on a contemporary project with saxophonist Jan Garbasek.

Tickets for tonight's concert are $15 ($5 with a BUID) and may be purchased at the Weis Center Box Office. The concert will begin at 8 p.m.

Aurelian Trio delights audiences

BY KATIE DEBONVILLE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Last Sunday night, the Aurelian Trio performed for a capacity crowd at Bucknell Hall. The trio, which features associate professor of music Genevieve Lee on piano, violinist Teresa Ling, and cellist Kelley Mikkelsen, was granted a residency under Bucknell's Kushell Music Endowment.

Established in 1971, the Kushell Music Endowment was funded by Charles J. and Isabelle Kushell, graduates of the class of 1927, in order to promote residencies and other programs within the Department of Music.

The evening's program consisted of three works for the piano, violin, and cello. The first of these was Beethoven's "Trio in C minor, Op.1, No.3." This four-movement trio, the first that Beethoven composed, is exemplary of the early Romantic era in which it was written. The violin and cello essentially served as back-up instruments for the piano, although the violin part was developed more than that of the cello.

The concert moved into the twentieth century with "Trio in E minor, Op. 67" by the Russian composer Dmitri Shostakovich. This trio is the only one in existence by Shostakovich. According to the members of the trio, Shostakovich did compose other trios; however, they were never published.

In contrast to the Beethoven piece, Shostakovich's trio is clearly a modern work that makes use of a greater range in all three of the instruments. The piece begins with the cello using harmonic overtones to reach notes that are usually in the high range of the violin, while the violin enters in an octave common to the cello.

Amy Clare—The Bucknellian

Genevieve Lee performed with the Aurelian Trio last Sunday night. A talented pianist, Lee is an associate professor of music.

Included among the twentieth century string techniques in this piece are the Bartok pizzicato, in which the strings of the instrument are plucked to create an unusual, often dissonant effect, and a bowing technique which causes notes to sound as though they are being smeared together. According to Ling and Mikkelsen, this technique would be frowned upon by other composers. However the unusual techniques and harmonies in the Shostakovich proved to be crowd-pleasers to Sunday night's audience.

After a brief intermission, the trio returned to finish the concert with Mendelssohn's "Trio in D minor, Op. 49". Written in the later Romantic era, this piece was marked by a richer sound than that of Beethoven. The two curtain calls following this piece were evidence of the audience's enjoyment.

During the week prior to their concert, the members of the Aurelian Trio worked with the advanced music theory class. They discussed textures, forms, harmonic complexities, and instrumental roles in the pieces that were performed on Sunday night.

In addition to the trio, the musicians also participated in other performing groups. Lee has performed with the Sao Paulo State Symphony Orchestra in Brazil, and she performs regularly as a solo pianist. Ling, a faculty member at several colleges, is both concertmaster and soloist with the South Dakota Symphony. Mikkelsen is in her fifth season as principal cellist, also with the South Dakota Symphony.

Lehigh buries wounded Bison, 38-16

Offense still reeling after loss of QB Travis Kopp '95; Bucknell to face Lafayette (6-3) tomorrow in Christy Mathewson Stadium

BY JON TERRY
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Without much fanfare, Bucknell's football team saw its record plummet to 3-6 after last Saturday's 38-16 loss at Lehigh (3-6). The Bison offense, which was the strength of the team for the first six weeks of the season, has been completely out of sync since starting quarterback Travis Kopp '95 went down with a broken ankle in week seven at Holy Cross.

Peter Harteveld '96 made his second consecutive start, completing nine of 14 passes for 68 yards against the Engineers.

Rob Glus '95 came in during the second quarter, completing 12 of 21 passes for 109 yards and one touchdown—a 10-yard toss to fullback Charron Anderson '93 in the third quarter. Harteveld did re-enter the game in the fourth period after Glus suffered a minor neck injury on a blindside hit.

Despite the inconsistent offense, the game might have at least been close had it not been for several special teams and defensive lapses.

Head coach Lou Maranzana's explanation for splitting the quarterback duties between Harteveld and Glus was that "We [the coaches] were trying to get them both in there to see if they could both continue to develop." Maranzana also commented that the loss of Kopp had "changed the chemistry of the entire offense."

Since Kopp took to crutches, a couple of telling statistics have arisen. In the first six games of the year, Kopp completed 65.7% of his passes; since then, Bison quarterbacks have been on target just 48.5% of the time. Also, in the first six games under Kopp, Bucknell averaged 341.3 yards of total offense per game, but since then, it has only compiled 234.3 yards per outing.

Left tackle Don Watson '94 opens up a hole for a Bison running back in a home game earlier this season.

Tailback Matt Walsh '93 was once again the workhorse out of the backfield, matching a school record with 37 carries, and gaining 116 yards. In piling up 196 all-purpose yards on the day, Walsh eclipsed the 1,000-yard mark for his career, and he now ranks thirteenth in Patriot League history in this category.

"Our running approach was much improved over last week," said Maranzana. "Walsh worked very hard, with help from Charron."

Whitey Berardinelli '93 also had a good day. After being held without a reception against Fordham, Berardinelli rebounded with six catches for 86 yards against the Engineers. The Rhodes Scholar candidate surpassed the 1,500-yard mark for his career, and he needs just 62 yards tomorrow to move past Mike Guerrini '89 into fifth place on the all-time school receiving yards list.

Despite the inconsistent offense, the game might have at least been close had it not been for several special teams and defensive lapses. On Lehigh's second drive of the game, quarterback Scott Semptimphelter completed a short second-and-ten pass to Dave Cecchini, who took advantage of missed tackling and broke into the clear for a 55-yard play down to the Bucknell 18-yard line that set up the Engineers' first touchdown.

On Bucknell's ensuing possession, first-time punter David Todd '95 dropped the snap, resulting in a Lehigh first down at the Bucknell 29-yard line. The miscue resulted in a short field goal, and just like that the Bison were down 10-0.

Bucknell did rebound early in the second quarter when Erik Klingner '94 kicked the team's first field goal of the year, and only the second since the start of the 1991 season. The 29-yard boot capped a seven-play, 40-yard drive that cut the lead to 10-3.

On Lehigh's next drive, however, Semptimphelter completed seven of nine passes, including a one-yarder to his tight end Sean McCarthy on fourth down for a touchdown. After having a first-and-goal from the three, the Bison defense stood its ground for three plays, but on fourth down Semptimphelter rolled to his right and found McCarthy open by just a step.

Running back Kevin McElvene '93 scoots upfield while avoiding would-be tacklers in Bucknell's 21-0 loss to Fordham this season.

Bucknell felt they were still in the game as they trailed by just two touchdowns to start the second half. However, after Glus and company could not muster a first down on the half's opening drive, the punting team came back on the field, and once again the stage was set for disaster. This time Lehigh's Ben Taylor was left untouched and he blocked Todd's punt.

Freshman Tony Perilla scooped up the loose ball and returned it 22 yards for a touchdown, effectively putting the game out of reach for the Bison.

Clearly, the injury to Kopp has seriously hurt the punting game. Kopp, who also served as the punter prior to his injury, had done an excellent job, averaging 37.1 yards per punt in the first six games. Since then, Todd and Jason Fralick '93 have averaged only 30.1 yards per punt. On a team that averages about

Following their standout performances this fall, Katrina Mueller '93, Almira Baldwin '94, and Patricia Way '94 were awarded positions on the 1992 All-Patriot League women's field hockey team.

Mueller provided the foundation for a Bison defense that held opponents scoreless six times this year, and was awarded this position for the third season in a row. The senior was also third in scoring for Bucknell with three goals and a pair of assists.

Baldwin, meanwhile, lit up the opposition in '92 with four goals and six assists. The forward currently is eighth on the Bison all-time scoring list (13 goals, nine assists) and was selected for the honor for the second straight year.

The third of Bucknell's representatives on the league team, Way, put in one goal and one assist from the midfielder position.

Patrick King '92, who led the men's basketball team to the Patriot League championship game against Fordham last year, will be returning to America this month during a tour with his TTL Bamberg professional franchise from Germany.

King's German First Division club is scheduled to take part in a nine-game exhibition against American collegiate squads in the Southwest.

TTL Bamberg will be squaring off against teams from Western New Mexico, Texas-El Paso, Mississippi College, Southern Mississippi, Sam Houston State, Houston, Southwest Texas State, Texas, and Texas-San Antonio from Nov. 14-28.

After the Breakin' Bison's 1991 campaign, King garnered the Patriot League's Most Valuable Player honors, then moved to Europe after graduation to play overseas.

After his performance at the U.S. Olympic Trials this past March, Jim Harvey '88 has earned a spot on this year's U.S. Swimming All-America Team.

Harvey, who was the University's men's water polo coach up until last year, left Bucknell this summer to join up with the University of Nebraska as an assistant swim coach.

The Bison graduate was selected for All-American honors after swimming one of the fastest times in the country in the 100-meter butterfly. At the Olympic Trials, Harvey placed 15th in this event with a time of 54:92.

For four straight years Harvey was named Outstanding Swimmer for the ECC Championships, and qualified for the NCAA Championships two times. He was also an 11-time East Coast Conference champion.

In 1991, Harvey led the Orange and Blue polo team to a 16-15 record.

Club Spikers go 3-2 in first Bucknell tourney

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The first annual Bucknell Invitational last Saturday proved to be a tremendous success for the Division II national champion men's club volleyball team. During a weekend in which Bucknell went 3-2 against the likes of Cornell, UMass, Penn, St Francis, and Albany, the team's high point had to be when it garnered a win versus the first varsity team it ever competed against.

That straight-set triumph set up a meeting with Penn in a contest that would have huge ramifications for both teams.

Last year, the squad went 18-2 in a season where it took home a national title from Buffalo, NY.

Bucknell's initial draw of opponents consisted of Cornell, Massachusetts, and the University of Pennsylvania. Penn was seeded second out of the eight teams in the tournament, and Cornell fourth. With the Bison seeded fifth, the outlook seemed grim for Bucknell (4-2) to advance out of pool play.

In its first best-of-three match, the Orange and Blue succumbed to Cornell 15-4, 13-15, 15-11. Cornell played extremely well and shut down the Bison with tremendous blocking and solid defense.

In the next meeting's first game, Bucknell rebounded to plaster UMass 15-2. However, the second game was a different story. The competition tightened up its play, and Bucknell barely squeaked by with a 15-13 win to take the match.

That straight-set triumph set up a meeting with Penn in a contest that would have huge ramifications for both teams. Penn was also 1-1 in pool play entering the match-up, but more importantly was the third best Division I men's club volleyball team on the East Coast last year. The winner would advance to the semi-finals, and Bucknell went on to do just that, crushing the perennial powerhouse 15-1, 15-11.

"The Penn match was very significant for us," said middle blocker Glenn Gesek '94. "Penn made it to the final four last year at the East Coast Championships in Rhode Island. Therefore, we seeded them second in the tournament behind St. Francis, who supports one of the few varsity programs on the East Coast. We owned Penn—It's that simple."

The Spikin' Bison then went on to play a previously undefeated team from St. Francis in the semi-finals.

The first game provided the most incredible about-face ever

Bison swimmers don't hold water vs. UMBC

Bucknell men's and women's teams get swept in first dual meet of the 1992 campaign

BY LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ahh the silence, the calm water lying still, encased and protected from its surroundings—what a serene view.

If you like this picture, too bad. This is the portrait that you won't see after this week, when the men's and women's swim teams caused some waves as they competed against the University of Maryland at Baltimore County (UMBC).

The men's team came out against the competition looking to improve upon its accomplishments from the 1992 season—one in which it compiled a 5-5 record and had seven league champions in last year's Patriot League Championships, a second place finish at the Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC) Championship meet and five ECAC champions.

This year's team, led by head coach Dick Russell and co-captains Jay Gross '93 (last year's Patriot League Co-Swimmer of the Year) and Marc Murphy '93, traveled down to the Free State and were taxed by the Retrievers by a score 138-97.

"I was pleased with the way the team swam," said Russell, despite the loss. "I thought they were excellent."

The men competed in thirteen events, though, and managed to garner only three first-place finishes. In the 400 relay medley, Heath Smith '94, Eric McCabe '95, Matt Jepsen '94 and Dave McGeorge '94 teamed up to win their race by roughly thirty seconds.

Elsewhere, Gross overpowered his opponents in the 50-free with a time of 21.55. Steve Droste '93, who is currently ranked second on Bucknell's all-time list in the 200-meter backstroke, won the event easily in a time of 1:57.54, almost three seconds ahead of his closest opponent in black and gold.

The team captured second place in nine of the ten remaining events—clearly, it was a case of always being the bridesmaid and never the bride.

Despite the loss in its inaugural meet of season, the quantity of swimmers and the quality of abilities that they possess will make this an interesting season at Freas-Rooke Pool. Apart from the loss of three great seniors from a year ago, there will be 11 letter winners returning.

Among those returners are Gross, Rick Steenson '95, and Droste in the short distance races. Dietrich Conze '94 and Stewart Harris '95, holder of the school record in the 100-yard and 1650-yard freestyles, will present depth in the freestyle distance races.

Kevin Britton '93 and Eric Carr '93, meanwhile, will provide points courtesy of their diving skills.

The Orange and Blue will also be assisted by a host of newcomers who Russell said "could be one of the best groups of freshmen in our history."

Under head coach Lynn Kachmarik, last season's Patriot League Coach of the Year, the women's 1992 campaign was a stunning success. During the season, 13 school records were broken and seven swimmers were crowned as league champions to go along with a stellar 8-2 mark.

The team captured second place in nine of the ten remaining events—clearly, it was a case of always being the bridesmaid and never the bride.

Co-captain Margaret Grunow '93, named as last year's Bucknell's Woman Athlete of the Year by the Bucknellian and Patriot League Swimmer of the Year, will hopefully lead the Bison to new depths. She returns as the league champion in the 50-yard freestyle, the 100-yard freestyle and the 100-yard butterfly and with a 32nd-place finish at U.S. Olympic trials in March under her belt. Co-captain Wendy Sheldon '93 and the remainder of the '91-'92 squad return in quest of the ever-elusive league title.

The women's team also traveled below the Mason-Dixon line to face the stiff competition from UMBC. Although they faired a little better in the score, the outcome was the same—a loss, 127-115.

"They are a really strong team," said Linda Fink '95. "They don't have a lot of depth but they have some really strong swimmers."

This proved to be true as UMBC out-muscled Bucknell for nine out of the thirteen first-place positions.

Grunow and Kathleen Hartnett '94 took part in all four Bison victories. Grunow set the tone by winning the 100- and 200-freestyle in 52.95 and 1:54.78, respectively, while Hartnett seized a first-place finish in the 50-freestyle in a time of 25.25 after she touched out her opponent by just .07 seconds.

Grunow and Hartnett then teamed up with Suzanne DiLenge '94 and Jeanne Klawon '95 to win the 400 relay freestyle in a time of 3:43.70.

This year's team has to be considered one of the toughest in the league. After finishing second in the Patriot League Championships in 1992 and having lost only one senior, the team has set its sights on the peak of the mountain.

With the leadership and superb abilities of Grunow and Hartnett, the women will prove to be stern competition against all opponents. The relay teams will be strengthened will Stephanie Boles '94, DiLenge, Klawon and Ann Marie Nielsen '94.

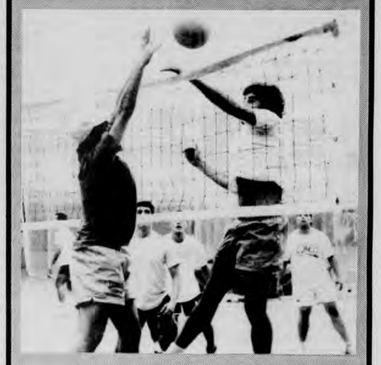
Long-distance swimmer Fink, who holds the school record in the 100 and 1650 freestyle events, will serve as the anchor over the long haul.

Divers Debra Zapotocky '94, Heather Steinfeld '96, and Julie Kotarba '95 will add strength to a traditionally weak area of the swim team.

With this experienced group and the remainder of the team filled with talent and enthusiasm, the 1992-1993 campaign will prove to be a successful one.

Tomorrow, both teams will travel to the city of Brotherly Love to compete against the fire-breathing Dragons from Drexel, in search of their first win of the young season.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK



Amy Frost—The Bucknellian

This past week, Chi Phi faced off against Lambda Chi Alpha on the volleyball courts in the fieldhouse to kick off Bucknell's second intramural season of 1992. Shown is Lambda Chi's Al Jewart '93 (white shirt) as he attempts to spike the ball down on the head of his Greek opponent. Chi Phi went on to win the match three to one. The match was played Tuesday in the Fieldhouse.

SPORTS ANALYSIS

Players just aren't having fun anymore...

The missing aspect of fun, which characterizes sport, was attributed to the fact that, according to Player 4, "Most of it has to do with coaching. All coaches have different styles, and if you like the coach you're playing for, you're going to have fun playing."

Captain John Lusk said that the morale was not as bad as the players made it to be. "The last two weeks it's been improving. Granted, we've been a frustrated team, but we still go out hard."

All four players, however, agreed that player 1 accurately described the morale of the team when he said, "The majority of the team does not have faith in Coach Lou."

This, in part, stems from a breakdown in communication between the players and Maranzana. According to player 4, "He has his own way of speaking, not like any other coach I've ever had. I think a lot of players don't relate to him, don't feel comfortable around him." Trying to find the right words he gave up and said, "It's hard to explain."

Lusk downplayed any communication problems. "He likes to use big words, that's about it. He was an English major at Dartmouth so that's his background," said the captain.

According to player 1, the problem extends beyond vocabulary; the players are lost somewhere between the parking lot and field. "The personality of the coaches is reflected on the field, not that of the players."

This disaffection has resulted in a situation where "The majority of players would tell you that there are many times when we have to say, 'Don't listen to coach, we can do it our way,'" said player 2.

Player 1 described his experience in a very matter-of-fact manner, "Whenever I go out to play or practice, I don't pay much mind to him [Maranzana]. It's something I've learned over the years."

Overall the players did not appear angry at Maranzana but rather disconnected from him as a coach. According to Player 3, "Definitely people are dissatisfied. He's not a bad person. It's just like, 'Coach, do something.'"

While Berardinelli said that "I can't really speak for the whole, team, but personally I have a very strong relationship with him," both captains said that some problems with the coach are natural on any team. According to Lusk, "It's human nature to complain about people in authority over you. Maybe he's made some bad calls here and there, but people are going to complain about it, no matter if he's Joe Paterno or anybody."

COACHING METHODS

Each of the players questioned Maranzana's ability to coach to varying degrees. Player 2 had the least faith in Maranzana. He said, "The problem with Coach Maranzana is that he doesn't know what he's doing, point blank. It doesn't seem like he knows what is supposed to happen in a football game."

Lusk, however, defended Coach Maranzana. "I don't feel that this should be a Lou Maranzana bashing article, or a football bashing article. There have been some bad choices, bad calls, maybe here and there. But, overall I think the coaching staff has done a pretty good job for the most part."

Failure to adapt his coaching methods to specific teams and situations was a weakness every player made specific reference to. "They don't make any adjustments," said player 2, "We get in the game, and if something's not working, they don't make adjustments to try to get something that works."

"Take for example, the Holy Cross game two years ago," said Player 3. "We were beating them 14-0 at the half. They came out and started blitzing our offense, and we just couldn't adjust. Obviously they adjusted and we didn't. We tend to stick to that conservative game plan no matter what."

However, Player 4 said that the season's failures should not be dumped solely on coaching. "I'm at the point now where we've got to start looking to ourselves, too. We're not executing. Some of it is coaching, but I can't see blaming it all on them."

Player 3 also tried to play down criticism of Maranzana. He said, "He has to know his stuff if he's been around football that long." However, he was very serious when he said, "When you come off the field and you say, 'Those guys are not better than us,' you feel like saying, 'Let's go right now, again, this time with no coaches and we could beat you.' You say why come out there and work harder when nothing's going to change?"

Each of the players agreed with player 3 to the extent that none of them thought the Bison would win a game that came down to coaching.

This lack of confidence is in part attributable to Coach Maranzana's lack of confidence in the team, according to player 2. "They show no confidence in a quarterback and quarterback is a position where you have to establish somebody to be a leader. If you keep taking somebody out of the game, that's not going to happen," said player 2 in reference to the team's 21-0 loss to Fordham two weeks ago. In that game, Maranzana started freshman Peter Harteveld at quarterback, then pulled him in favor of Rob Glus '95, then later in the same half shifted back to Harteveld.

However, according to all of the players, Maranzana's lack of confidence in the team extends far beyond merely one position.

MOTIVATION

"Coach Maranzana's motivational skills are lacking," said player 1. Player 2 agreed, "His ability to motivate; poor, very poor."

According to player 4 the team recognizes this is a problem area, "To put it bluntly, he's terrible. I think this year our captains went up and asked if they could talk after him, I know in past years there have been a couple captains who asked if he wouldn't talk at all."

Lusk explained that he "was an integral part in talking to the coach and in having the captains speak after the coach. It was only to get more adrenaline pumping, which lasts about five minutes."

As far as assessing the motivation abilities of Coach Maranzana, Lusk said he thought it was inappropriate to do so. "I personally feel that what goes on behind those doors, the regular Bucknellian has no right to know. Granted, we may have problems here or there. We see ourselves as a family, and whatever goes on behind locker room doors is up to us to take care of. And whether Coach Lou is a good motivator, I don't think people have the right to know," said the captain.

Berardinelli did say that, "He puts in an effort, I guess. He's no Knute Rockne, but not everybody is."

According to the players, the problem may link back to lack of confidence in the team on the part of the coach. Every player described a feeling of being sold short by coach Maranzana. "There have been times when the team has the idea that we have the ability to beat the team we are playing. Coach Maranzana, however, only wants us to 'hang in' every game, but we think we can beat some of the teams," said player 1.

They agreed that their perception that Maranzana was not effectively motivating the team exists throughout the team. According to player 3, "He's done things in the past so that no matter whether he says something good now, it's hard to take him seriously because of what he's said in the past. It's not like one time. It needed a miracle, and they had to play their worst game ever — that they were going to have to play below their ability and we were going to have to play exceptional and get a lot of breaks. I couldn't believe it. For me, hoping to be a future coach, you just can't do that. Anybody can beat anybody else on a given day."

Player 3 said that he felt that Maranzana was selling Bucknell short. "Villanova's tough, but they weren't like Miami."

Player 4, like the others, seemed pained at the memory, as he struggled to explain how the Maranzana's remarks made him feel during the game, "I just tried to block it out of my head. I was so up for that game, it was a chance to play a ranked team in the country. It didn't help. It frustrated me and made me angry. I felt like he wasn't giving us a chance in hell."

Berardinelli attempted to explain the purpose of Maranzana's pre-game talk as "putting the game in a realistic perspective, and I think some people realized that. Some players may have been a little distraught at some comments. I don't know how to put the reaction," said the captain.

None of the players saw any malice lurking behind Maranzana's comments, they all attributed it to his particular style. For whatever reason however, there was a breakdown of communication in the message.

PLAY CALLING

The lack of a connection between players and coach may stem from their feeling that the offensive plays the team runs are more a reflection of the coaching staff than the player personnel according to player 2.

"All of the schemes look great on paper, but every player is different. If we would do some different things, if he would let us play our game instead of his game, we would do much better."

An integral aspect of calling plays is using the right personnel for the right situation. Player 3 said that the uniqueness of players' abilities seem to be lost in the offensive scheme. "You talk about utilizing talent such a built up attitude, even for the incoming freshmen."

Although player 3 said that lack of effective motivation by the coach has been a chronic concern, he, as well as the other players did point to specific incidents in the past as examples.

Two of the players cited the beginning of the season as a prime example. "Even in the beginning of the year he said, 'Hopefully, we can win two out of our first three games.' That just doesn't motivate you," said player 4.

Berardinelli defended the coach on that score and explained the Maranzana did not intend for the players to take the remark as a putdown. The captain said, "That can be misconstrued, what he's saying is that we want to get the season off on the right foot and get rolling, and I think we as players realize that. He's saying, go out and have a strong start to the season and get some momentum going into the league schedule."

Every player said that the Villanova game was the most painful example of Maranzana's lack of motivational skills. Rather than merely not getting his message across, in this case the coach's pre-game comments "definitely diminished our confidence," said player 2.

Specifically, according to player 4, "He said that we You've got Brian Henesey and they make him slash and cut. He's the kind of guy that will run over someone between the tackles. But they've got Kevin [McElvene '93] who runs a 4.4, let him take a sweep, or run him to the wide side, not to the weak side."

The offensive plays are called primarily by coach Michael O'Connor while Maranzana calls the defensive plays. However, the players said that they held Maranzana to be responsible for not insisting that the offense move away from ineffective strategies.

Each player used the same two words to describe the offense: conservative and predictable. According to player 2, "We're too predictable. We just telegraph everything. We have only three run plays: slant, a toss, and we run the draw all the time. Everyone knows what we're going to do before we do it. We joke around on the sidelines that the other team's mothers are calling the plays." Player 1 agreed, "There's no disguising; team's know what to expect from us."

Berardinelli agreed to an extent and said, "I think we are a little too predictable, sometimes teams know what's coming."

However, the captain also said that one must realize that hindsight is always twenty-twenty. "You can always criticize the play calling. If the play doesn't work than it's going to be criticized, but, if you bust it for a big gain than no one is complaining."

Lusk refused to comment on any aspects of the play calling.

While the players said that they thought bad play calling was reflected in the team's losing record, the real concern seemed to be for the feeling that the players themselves were lost somewhere in the shuffle. Every player said that suggestions have been made to the coaches, suggestions which, they said, have fallen upon deaf ears.

The issue of using some different play "has been brought up before," said player 1. "But they [the coaches] feel it has been successful. When we give advice it is seldom heard or utilized."

RACIAL STEREOTYPES

In addition to questions about Maranzana's coaching on the field, some of the players said that they thought racial stereotyping on the part of the coaching staff did exist. Of the four players, two found it to be a problem, and two did not think it occurred. However, there were differences in each player's assessment of the problem.

Both of the captains said that they thought racial stereotyping was not a problem.

Player 1 said, "The coaches seem to push the black athletes a lot harder than they push white athletes."

Player 2 said that although "there is definitely a problem with the coaches, I'm not sure whether it's intentional or not."

While player 3 said he does not see "stereotyping as a major issue. . . there are players who do."

Player 4 said that he did not think there was a problem, but that there have been some black athletes who haven't been playing even though he thought they should. "Kevin [McElvene '93] is one of the best backs in the league and he hasn't played, and I can't see why. For some reason I don't think it's racially motivated. It might be teacher's pet syndrome, but I don't think it's racially motivated."

Another player mentioned McElvene, "A prime example is Kevin McElvene. Basically since his freshman year he has been at the caliber he's at now. But not till now has he played, he had to be a superman to be noticed," said player 1.

When The Bucknellian attempted to speak to McElvene over the phone, he refused to make any comment.

Player 1 continued, and said that "a lot of black athletes coming in have to be two or three times faster and better to get in. Every recruiting class gets a lot of good black athletes that could start, but it takes injuries before they can get in there."

The other players did not agree with player 1, except for player 2 who agreed to a limited extent. He said that the player 1's description could be applied to the offense, but not to the defense. "For a black player to play on offense, they have to produce a lot more than a white player."

Both players 1 and 2 said that there was a phenomenon whereby, "It seems that there have been a lot of good black offensive players who have been recruited and come up freshman year and immediately they're put on defense except for a few, who, when they stay, don't play. They don't play them on offense," said player 2.

Player 1 described the same phenomenon and offered an explanation for it. "Most of the black athletes are put on defense even if they come in as offensive players. The excuse they use is that we need more speed on defense, so they automatically assume that if your black, you have more speed."

Berardinelli said that, "When you come into camp you play offense and defense and the coaches see where your skills are best suited. If that's the case [with black players on defense], then I think it's just coincidental."

There is the perception that some sort of racial stereotyping exists, at least on the part of players 1 and 2. The fact that such a perception exists for some of the team is in itself a problem.

INJURIES

There is a tension that exists between the coaches and team trainer, Laurie Augustine whereby players who are injured tend to get caught in the middle, according to the players.

Player 2 said, "The trainers usually talk to the player first and would say something like 'I think you should get some rest.' Then Coach Lou and some of the other coaches will say, 'We think you can play, you're fine.'"

All of the players agreed that pressure, more or less pronounced, is exerted on the players to get them to come back from an injury before they normally would.

Berardinelli characterized it more as part of the nature of the sport. "I don't know if they put pressure on them. I think that's just kind of expected in the game. You don't want to miss practice, you want to play."

According to player 3, "The coaches are kind of ignorant. The trainer says you can't come back but they'll still ask you. They definitely make you feel like you should come back if you're ready or not. You want to come back soon because they keep on asking you."

Such subtle pressure has consequences varying from greatly risking a recurrence of the injury, to coming back a day before one would like to do so, said the players.

See PLAYERS, page 17

A major theme for some players is that there has never been a strong relationship between Maranzana and his team. However Maranzana maintained, "I spend a lot of time getting to know them. I spend a lot of time in the office with them. People have different styles of dealing with players. I'm basically here because I care about the kids. And I spend a lot of time with them from the time they're freshmen to the time they're seniors."

... and Lou Maranzana doesn't know why

I'm basically here because I care about the kids. And I spend a lot of time with them from the time they're freshman to the time they're seniors."

Hartzell said that from his position as athletic director, "It seems to me he relates well to the guys, from what I see. The players know they can talk to me about any problems they have. I've never received any indication that the relationship was not good."

The lines of communication are key to establishing a relationship with the players. "I think that I can communicate well, I can speak the English language," said Maranzana. "It's always an interesting thing when you're communicating across generational lines."

Maranzana stressed the importance of the individual coaches rather than himself in that "they are the contact that our football players have with our program. I try my best to do as much communicating with the guys individually as I can but day to day the coaches are the ones who really touch the players."

COACHING METHODS

One area in which some players have voiced concern is the team's ability to adapt to specific game situations. Maranzana downplayed the necessity to do so since "during the game we very, very seldom have great surprises in terms of what we see from the opposing team. Consequently we very seldom totally change the approach."

Instead, Maranzana characterized any changes that would be made as modifications to the existing game plan. "We do change, however, for things that we're having difficulty with to try to make adjustments within the scheme rather than to try and change the whole scheme."

Hartzell said that he regarded the question of whether Maranzana was able to adapt to other teams as "as tough question to answer. I say like anyone else, 'Why didn't we do this or that.' And I'm sure there are situations where we should've made adjustments but I think we do okay in the big picture."

Questions about the confidence that Maranzana displays in the team focused on his apparent indecision regarding which quarterback to keep in during the loss to Fordham two weeks ago. But Maranzana said, "I think they understand exactly what we were doing. It's really not all that different from any other position. We gave them both an opportunity to kind of work within the situation. It happens at other positions as well, it's more noticeable."

Associate athletic trainer, Laurie Augustine, tends to injuried Bison safety Todd Jessup '94.

On the whole, Maranzana said that he is confident in his team despite the misgivings of some players. "How confident am I today? I'm more confident than I was last week because those guys had one more week. I'm generally confident. As soon as you change the personalities our confidence level is not going to be quite as great," said Maranzana referring to the high number of personnel changes which have resulted from injuries.

He said that he tries to convey his confidence in his players directly. "Tell them, and do not bail out on them anywhere along the line in terms of the plan."

MOTIVATION

A major concern that players expressed with Maranzana was his ability to motivate his players. However, he said that the coaching staff attempts to motivate the players "every way we can. It begins in the off-season in terms of goal-setting and personal focus. One of the biggest things that we've tried to do is get every one of our players to understand that they have a responsibility to themselves to somehow contribute as much as they can to the football team."

In response to the question of motivation, Hartzell said that he thought that "the right things were being said." Furthermore, Hartzell said that one must be careful not to overemphasize the importance of the coach's role in motivating the players. "You've got to be able to motivate yourself."

Maranzana defended his effectiveness. "One of the things that was a big concern when I began was how the players felt about playing, how they felt about their own personal motivation. I feel that over the years that I've been here, they have responded."

Bison football head coach Lou Maranzana

A particularly sour point for the players, was the coach's pre-game speech at the Villanova game. However, Maranzana pointed to completely different material than did the players, when he summarized his remarks. "I think before the Villanova game what we talked about at the time was that everybody needed to understand that the task at hand was one that would be accomplished by everybody fulfilling a part and that somehow all those parts fit together in a way that sometimes we don't understand. As long as we ourselves all provide as much as we can possibly provide, that somehow together, all those efforts kind of synergize so that the sum of the parts is greater than the whole."

In response to the concerns about the specific remarks in which players said that they felt the coach was selling the team short, Maranzana said, "You are asking about one game. I don't think that I was negative at all before that game. To understand and be realistic about the nature and the size of the challenge, I don't think that was really wrong."

Hartzell, said that he "couldn't speak to the specifics of it so I won't." But he did support an honest approach. "I don't think there's anything wrong with being truthful. However, if the word 'miracle' was used, that would not be appropriate."

One player did paraphrase the coach's speech using the word 'miracle.' It is unclear whether that word was used, but it is clear that way that the player remembered the speech was in those terms.

PLAY CALLING

One particular area of disaffection for the players was with the offensive play calling. In particular, some players said that they felt that the offensive scheme was more a reflection of the coaches than the players. Maranzana said that the opposite is the case. "Our plan has always been to create a plan where the players can win the game. We don't ever want to have anything that's so complex and so coach centered and manipulative that the players aren't able to know exactly what they're doing and feel comfortable."

Player dissatisfaction with the offensive play calling was focused mainly on Maranzana. However, according to Maranzana his role in the offense is not that great. "I have a role in creating the choices for offensive play calling, participating in the design of the choices. When it comes to actually selecting from those choices on game day, I'm not making those choices. They're making them in the press box with Coach O'Connor."

The most specific and wide-ranging criticism of the offensive play calling is that it is too predictable for other teams. Even Hartzell agreed to a limited extent, "In some cases other people can predict what's coming. But it's not any different than any other team. I think we try to do what our talent level allows us."

When asked about this particular criticism Maranzana said, "Obviously I don't think our offense is too predictable." But he was also quick to distinguish between different senses of predictability. "Predictable with respect to the type of runs, perhaps. And I think that's true of every team in America. And in terms of the types of things that we do in the passing game, yes that is very predictable. But if you're talking about when exactly we will do whatever we will do, I don't think we're any different than any other team in that way."

RACIAL STEREOTYPES

There were a few players who said that they thought that the black players were treated differently by the coaches. Maranzana said that racial stereotyping did not occur, "definitely, not for the coaches."

Two players said that they observed a lot of black players who were recruited for offense, being converted to defense. Maranzana said that players are not really recruited for one particular position. "We make no guarantees about a position to our recruits. The only guarantee we make is that we will keep a guy at a position for a certain length of time and give him a look."

Furthermore, Maranzana specifically responded to the charges when he said, "I don't think we're prone to look at our players on either side. We try to put our players on both sides of the football according to their abilities."

INJURIES

Players described a tension in the locker room between the trainers and the coaches. Sometimes the players felt caught in the middle. Laurie Augustine, associate athletic trainer, agreed with this characterization, but also explained that it is commonplace in college athletics, and that happy mediums are possible. "You want the kid to be healthy and whole and the coach wants him back to play. It's the typical trainer-coach conflict. Fortunately for me, I've been able to reach a lot of compromises."

Everyone acknowledged that there it is important to get the player back as soon as possible. "I think that we push the players to return to playing as soon as possible. And sometimes we ask players to discover what's possible."

Augustine said that any player who returns to action must be cleared through her. "I do not let somebody play if I don't think they're ready to play. If I think they're 80% and yet they can play, I'm going to do everything in my power to at least get them out there and doing some things. If I think that them going out there is going to injure them further, I'm not going to let them go."

However, there is still a grey area when it comes to possible career ending injuries such as the one mentioned by a Player 4 in the companion article. Augustine said that due to legal precedent, a doctor cannot stop an individual from playing regardless of the potential health risk. "The bottom line is after the athlete gets medically disqualified, if that person still wants to play, they're still allowed to play. But the doctor is no longer liable." The team's policy is that "if the kid wants to play he can continue to play," said Augustine, "and I'm going to do everything I can to help him out."

Maranzana said that in cases where a player is advised to leave the game for health reasons, "My role would be very slim because it's kind of out of my hands." But since the decision is up to the individual player, Maranzana acknowledged that a coach could have some influence. "If the doctor said this kid can't play, would I go and tell the kid you can play? There are different kinds of situations and I think what you will find about doctors advising young people is that you are going to get a variety of advice. Have we allowed kids to look for different kinds of advice overall in terms of getting another opinion? Yeah!"

Lou Maranzana did not point to one particular reason for the year and a half long slide. He acknowledged that it has not been the result of a sharp decline in the level of player talent. "I think it's comparable. A big difference, however, is that we played with more seniors at skill positions in 1990-91."

Athletic Director Rick Hartzell

While Hartzell was upset and questioned, "We can win in everything else, but why not football?", he was reassuring when asked about Maranzana's prospects for the future at Bucknell. He said, "Lou Maranzana is our football coach. He's got a contract to be our football coach. At this point in time, I can't see any reason why he shouldn't be our football coach."

Maranzana understands that there will be problems and criticisms. But he pointed out, "Coaching at Bucknell is not an easy proposition when you look at the history of what's gone on here. I believe that this project is achievable, but it's a tough challenge. We have a lot of young guys who have put themselves into the progress we've made up to this point. Just because we faced frustration lately doesn't mean that we haven't made progress and don't take pride in that, and that we don't want to go on and have successive success."

Will Coach Maranzana be retained for another year? According to Maranzana, "We'll have to see. I hope so."

"In a lot of cases when players are hurt and they could use extra rest, the coaches push them into playing," said player 2.

More often than not, the degree of pressure varies with importance of the injured team member, said player 4. "I've seen a lot of that this year, coaches pushing people to play before they're ready. It seems to depend on the person. If it's a starter or someone they feel is important to our scheme the coaches are like, 'Can you come back? Can you come back?'"

Each player said that they thought some players may have been injured because they came back too early from a previous injury. There is one such player "on the team who has a real bad injury and the doctor told him it will never get better. And he said, 'You can't have a more legitimate excuse not to play football again.' And the coaches are telling him to go get a second opinion, and if the second opinion says he should go play, that he should make the decision. This guy is risking a serious injury," said player 4.

This player, as well as another one who was mentioned as having aggravated an injury, both declined to give any comment to The Bucknellian when they were called.

Although the players realize that these are serious concerns, they also said that they understood the complexity of the issue for the coaches. "I guess you do get some guys who sort of milk their injuries as far as not really trying to get back as much as they could," said player 4.While some of the specifics differed, the players agreed on one thing. Something is wrong with the football team that goes beyond winning and losing.

Aside from the fact that "the coaches really weren't prepared for losing," according to player 1, very little has changed since the football team's 7-4 record in 1990-91 season to now. "I can't say that the talent of the athletes has gone down. I think it's gone up. We have a lot of guys playing now who should have been starting then."

Player 2 said that the same problems existed in 1990-91, and that "in fact, we should have won a couple more games that we lost. A lot of things should have been done differently then."

Player reaction was mixed when the topic of the individual coaches was brought up. Some thought that most of the individual coaches were good, while others found fault with them the same way they all did with Maranzana.

The thing that stands out is the players sense that they are disconnected from Coach Lou Maranzana. More than dislike, the relationship seems to be characterized misunderstanding and confusion as to his goals and tactics.

Two of the players said that their eligibility notwithstanding, they would probably not return for another year. Player 2's decision would "depend on if he [Maranzana] is still here. If there were a lot of coaching changes I would definitely be back."

Player 1 said he "was thinking about early retirement, the only thing I would come back for is my teammates." However, if Maranzana did not return, "I would definitely be back."

Each of the players said that they thought that a new coach would be a positive move for the program. According to player 4, "I think that would be great. I think that would help." He didn't take his criticism of his coach lightly however. "I just think a head coach has to relate. I don't think Coach Lou really does. I don't think he's really a bad coach," player 4 continued after a pause and a searching look "maybe he just goes against my standards, but I think most of the team feels like that."

Both captains said they thought that Maranzana would be back again next year. Berardinelli also said that he thought Maranzana would be back. Lusk said that it was not his place to comment on that subject.

When the subject of a new coach was brought up player 3 said, "I've been thinking about that. If a head coach could come in and help change the attitude that would be great. If Coach Lou could do it that would be even better." He paused as his tone grew heavier, "But I don't think he could change. I guess a new coach would be better for the program as a whole." Again, his tone was not of anger, but of despair. It was as if he had searched for every possible way to take back his team without conflict, but he could not escape his own conclusion.

The Bucknell football program is definitely missing something more than a few wins. The excitement and enthusiasm that characterize the game seem to be lacking for a myriad of reasons. According to player 4, "People have asked me how I am going to feel after I graduate. I've always said, 'I'm going to miss the game, but I won't miss playing here.' It has not been truly fun for me here, but the game itself, I still love."

Men's soccer 1992: so close, and yet...

Bison improved on last season's 6-11 record, but fail in crucial contests against inferior opponents

BY NEIL BARDACH AND MIKE MELESKY
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Last week, the Bison men's soccer team completed its season with a 1-0 loss to Drexel which denied the team a .500 record for the fall. However, the squad did end the season with a stronger mark than last year, finishing a respectable 7-9-1.

In 1991, the Bison struggled to a 6-11 mark.

While the team rounded out this fall with a losing record, though, a closer look at the season shows that a few tight games could easily have changed the complexion of its 1992 campaign:

•Early in the year the team dropped a tough 1-0 game to Holy Cross, and the setback unfortunately put the Bison in the record books. It was the first time that the Crusaders, who went on to finish the season with a ghastly 1-17-1 record, had ever recorded a Patriot League win. Clearly, this was one that the Bison should have taken.

•Only a week later, Bucknell lost a game that was simply stolen away. In a scoreless contest against Patriot League rival Colgate that went into overtime, the Orange and Blue were victims of over-zealous officiating (there were eight bookings in the match), and fell by a score of 1-0. It was the best game the team had played to that point in the season, and the letdown from such a demoralizing loss carried over into the next contest.

•Later that week, the Bison fell again by a 1-0 count, this time to the lowly Division II Bloomsburg Huskies. Inexplicably, the Bucknell offense once more could not turn the key in the ignition.

•The back-breaker, however, came late in the season when the Bison played against the Fordham Rams. The game, which was a must-win for Bucknell if it was to have a shot at post-season play, was scoreless heading into overtime. The day seemed destined to end in a tie, but with a little over 30 seconds remaining in the final overtime period, the Rams capitalized on a free kick just outside the Bison penalty area for the only goal of the game.

THE HIGH POINTS

All was not bad for the Orange and Blue this year, however. The team started off with a 3-1 record, handling a tough Pittsburgh squad at the beginning of the year (1-0), and following up with a convincing 2-0 win over Kutztown to open at home.

The squad dropped its next match to a overpowering Lehigh team, but came back with one of the most dominating offensive displays in school history. On Sept. 15, Bucknell beat up on Susquehanna University by a score of 8-0. It should be noted that going into the game, Susquehanna had allowed a total of nine goals to their two previous opponents combined.

Another highlight in the season was the team's surprising 3-0 win against Lafayette, where the Bison stampeded the hosts in Easton. Not only was it a well-played game in unfriendly territory, but it also provided that oh-so-evasive first Patriot League victory of the season.

In this meeting, additionally, Bucknell showed a well-diversified attack. Leading-scorer Greg Beatty '95 sparked the offense in a new role, as he assisted on all three goals. At this point in the season, opposing defenses were attempting to take Beatty out of the game by focusing their schemes on him, and it was good to see others on the team pick up the scoring burden.

This was an attack that could provide pressure from all directions and would be nearly unstoppable at times. However, one has to wonder where this fire disappeared to for the remainder of the season, until it resurfaced when the United States Naval Academy (10-6-2) came into Lewisburg.

Not surprisingly, the best performance of the year for the team was the final home game against the Midshipmen. Going into the contest this past Parents Weekend, Navy merely needed a tie to clinch a berth in the Patriot League postseason tournament. Early on, it seemed as though they would do much better than that, as the Middies jumped out to an early 2-0 lead, including a goal only 90 seconds into the game.

Navy dominated from the outset, and it seemed as though the Bison would finish their home season with a horrible spanking at the hands of a superior foe. Instead, Bucknell responded to the challenge with its most ferocious offensive attack of the year, repeatedly barraging Navy's net and at length notching two goals to tie the contest.

The game ended at 2-2 after overtime, and was easily the most exciting match of the year. Jon MacKenzie '93 assisted one of the goals against the Midshipmen, adding to his career assist totals, and eventually finished third in the school's history in that category.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Craig Shrock '94, seen here booting the ball upfield during a home game last month, should see increased playing time next year when coach Craig Reynolds digs deeper into this season's youthful talent.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Jon MacKenzie '93 attempts to muscle an opponent away from the ball in a game in Lewisburg earlier this fall. The senior midfielder ranks third in all-time assist totals for Bucknell.

OFFENSIVE MVP'S

MacKenzie was a dynamo on the team, and he redefined the meaning of the word hustle. If there was ever a loose ball to be played, MacKenzie would most likely be the first man into the fray. His physical, driven play endeared him to his teammates and the fans, if not necessarily to the officials.

The team's top offensive player, though, was again Beatty. For the second straight year the sophomore led the team in goals, as well as total offensive points. Late in the season there was an appreciable dropoff in Beatty's production, but that was due to his being double-teamed every time the Bison went on the offensive.

This did lead to opportunities for his teammates, but the team's drop in scoring toward the end of the season (with the exception of the Navy game) is testament to Beatty's importance on a squad that did not score an overwhelming number of goals during the year.

DEFENSIVE MVP'S

The key to such a low-scoring team is the defense, and although all of the Bison defenders played solidly throughout the season, two players were especially instrumental in the team's well-being in the rear.

Backer Pete Rodano '95 was a mainstay here, and though he suffered from a lack of playing time around the middle of the season, he never let up. The defense was obviously missing something when Rodano was absent, and while the four Bison defenders played well regardless of who was in the game, they simply weren't as good without Rodano.

The other mainstay defensively, and one who emerged as the team leader, was goalkeeper Mark Wrigley '94. Wrigley made the bare minimum of mistakes, and his strong play extinguished many a threatening situation in front of the goal mouth. With Wrigley returning next year, the team can look forward to another splendid season in the net.

Bidding the team farewell this year are seniors MacKenzie, Scott Tardibuono, and Edward Siddons.

While MacKenzie enjoyed the spotlight, Tardibuono quietly had a very potent year. The midfielder made the most of the playing time he received, and contributed offensively in key situations this year with three goals and one assist.

Siddons was also solid in '92, despite missing a portion of the season down the stretch with an injury.

The trio will be sorely missed, above all, for the leadership they provided the squad with.

Luckily, the Bison have only these three seniors leaving the team, so next year will not be one from which coach Craig Reynolds has to start from scratch. In fact, this year's team became considerably more mature and cohesive as the season progressed, and the players can expect this cohesiveness to carry over into next year's schedule.

In other words, look for Bucknell's stock to continue to rise in 1993.

Bucknell riders take third at Seton Hill

Penn State and WIlson pull away from the Bison during shows' last classes on Sunday

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

Bucknell's equestrian team traveled to Seton Hill College last Sunday to compete in the third of its four horse shows this fall. Each of the eleven teams of the region participated, including arch-rivals Wilson and Penn State.

Limited to just twenty rides, as were all other teams, Bucknell gathered its riders and endured the sub-freezing weather to pull together a fine effort that resulted in a third-place finish. Just slightly ahead was Wilson, while first place overall went to Penn State.

The Seton Hill show got off to a somewhat rocky start for all involved as the horses showed their reaction to the cold weather, many becoming nervous and overly excited and making it difficult for even the best riders to handle them. Run-outs, rubs, and refusals abounded throughout the morning fence classes as riders attempted to guide their unfamiliar mounts through rather tight courses in the small Seton Hill ring.

"It's not the course, it's the horses that have been difficult," commented team captain Jo Meszoly '93.

Good, clean rides were the exception instead of the rule, but all the jumping was completed without a single fall or injury, and Bucknell riders finished the morning in close standing with Wilson and PSU. Particularly outstanding performances for Bucknell were turned in by Brenda Rose '94, who took second place in intermediate over fences, and Holly Lynch '95, who placed first in novice over fences.

The Bison had hoped to gain the lead that afternoon by outriding their competitors on the flat as they had often done in the past. For the remainder of the day, the three top teams battled each other in the show ring, the point riders striving to gain scoring points for their team while non-point riders attempted to hold them back.

Suzy Bobeck '96, Jill Greybill '96, and Amy Brent '95 all placed second in open on the flat, walk-trot, and advanced walk-trot-canter, respectively. However, Penn State gradually took the scoring lead and Wilson edged ahead of Bucknell in the last few classes to end the show in that order.

Overall, the Bucknell riders were again somewhat dissatisfied with the judging, as many apparently strong rides were consistently graded low.

Last week against Scranton and Penn State, the Orange and Blue encountered similar problems with that show's judging, placing fourth out of the nine teams in the competition.

The team hopes to do better when it competes this Sunday at IUP for its last show of the semester. Indeed, the equestrian team will still be searching for that elusive first place and a shot at becoming this year's regional champs as it closes out the first half of the season.

played by Bucknell's club squad. While being humiliated early on, 14-6, the Bison appeared to be an inferior team. But after Brain Sell '94 was hit in the head by a St. Francis spike, the Bison, led by Sell, Ben Jarosz '94, and Chris Dycka '93, staged one of the greatest single-game comebacks to occur in Davis Gym. In front of approximately 170 people, Bucknell somehow came back to completely shock St. Francis with ten unanswered points, winning 16-14. The game ended with a stuff block by freshman sensation Matt Kraus.

Riding on the momentum of that incredible game, Bucknell cruised past a stunned St. Francis squad 15-11 into the finals of the team's first-ever home tournament.

In the finals Bucknell played Albany, who came into the game red-hot after defeating Cornell in the other semi, but the squad was confident since St. Francis defeated Albany earlier in pool play.

Perhaps, though, it was too confident. Albany was just too much for the Bison in the finals and defeated Bucknell in straight sets 15-7, 15-11.

It was a disappointing way for the Bison to end their magnificent day, but what a day it was for the first-ever tourney at Lewisburg. Bucknell time and time again proved that it can win under high pressure, and that it had the ability to win the big games.

After playing four straight matches this past Saturday, it was obvious that Bucknell simply ran out of gas against Albany. However, the Bison will have a second shot at Albany and Cornell in Cortland, NY on Nov. 22.

In its first game of the 1992 season, the team defeated Elizabethtown with little difficulty, 15-1, 15-3, 15-3.

Athlete of the Week

Matt Walsh '93

Football running back Matt Walsh '93 earns Athlete of the Week honors for the week of Nov. 13 for his performance in Bucknell's 38-16 loss to the Lehigh Engineers.

Walsh matched a school record by tallying 37 carries en route to an 116-yard rushing effort. His 196 all-purpose yards allowed him to go over the 1,000-yard mark for his career. The senior currently ranks thirteenth in all-purpose yards.

Walsh hails from Wilkes-Barre, PA, and is pursuing a bachelor's degree in international relations.

Women's rugby knocks off Juniata, 19-0

BUCKNELLIAN TEAM CORRESPONDENT

After its 19-0 blowout of Juniata College this past Saturday, Bucknell's women's club rugby team co-captain Karen Beck '93 had nothing but praise for the squad's 1992 season.

"This year's women's rugby team is the best Bucknell has had in three years," said Beck. "The women are an extraordinarily talented, unified group who have made a place for themselves ranking among the best in Eastern Pennsylvania. With the season winding down this Saturday, we are looking forward to more highly competitive matches in the spring."

For the most part, the Bison (4-1) have been been unstoppable this fall, as their shutout of Juniata on the road showed. The game last weekend was rough and many players were hurt by the aggressive, unrefined play of Juniata. Fortunately, Bucknell's women retained their composure in the midst of several questionable calls and sloppy execution and went on to a relatively easy victory.

The Bison club squad operates out of the Eastern Pennsylvania Rugby Union, a division that includes teams from Princeton, Penn, Bryn Mawr, Shippensburg, Swarthmore, Scranton, and West Chester. The fall season is the most vital stretch of the year for Bucknell, as it plays all of its divisional matches during this time. The Orange and Blue's second semester action begins in March, although practice will begin next February.

The squad's 1992 campaign started out earlier this fall with an awesome display of power, aggression, and teamwork in its crushing 25-0 defeat of Shippensburg University. This victory came as both a surprise and a delight, for no one could have expected that a team that has so many freshmen on its roster would humble the primarily upperclassman experience of Shippensburg. Bucknell's women, additionally, had not defeated a Shippensburg team in over three years.

This killer spirit was not as apparent in their next win over the University of Pennsylvania, but the 27-0 triumph proved to be just as devastating.

Rugby is scored according to tries, place kicks and drop kicks. A try, similar to a touchdown but the ball must be placed down for the score, is worth five points. A conversion kick after the try is worth two points, and a drop kick, which can be put through the uprights at any point in the game, is worth three points and is terribly difficult to do successfully.

Kerri Steckler '93 throws the ball in to teammates (L to R) Tara Calloway '95 and Dawn Soisson '96 in the team's 23-0 loss to Princeton on Oct. 17. The defeat was the only one suffered by the team this year.

"There were five of them and only one of me—I had to bite one of them."
—Dawn Soisson '96

Against Princeton University, though, Bucknell was not fortunate enough to see either try or kick. The 23-0 loss that the Bison suffered at the hands of the Tigers was their only setback of the year, yet served as a learning experience for the team. Players realized their vulnerabilities and spent the weeks ahead practicing hard to prevent such future letdowns from occurring again. Princeton's tricks and talents, not surprisingly, became Bucknell's in the games ahead.

The Orange and Blue's revitalized spirits and improved skills were then tested against Swarthmore University over Parents Weekend in late October. The team was so charged up, in fact, that the referee needed to repeatedly warn against the overwhelming aggressiveness on Bucknell's side. It was not one of the squad's prettiest victories, but the intensity and enjoyment reflected in the cheers of both players and parents alike seemed to bring Swarthmore to its knees.

An example of the game's rugged style of play was probably best reflected in the words of Dawn Soisson '96: "There were five of them and only one of me—I had to bite one of them."

Who would have believed this is part of the game? Players are required to wear mouthguards, and, needless to say, Bucknell learned why along with a Swarthmore player's arm.

Pads do not cushion these women, so the only protection from the other team is one's wits.

To attend a rugby game is to experience the full desire of player and her opposition. This passion, along with flying tackles, break-through runs, and an insurmountable will to win have led this year's women's rugby team to its finest season ever.

The squad will meet up with Frostburg, who it lost to on the road in 1991, in its last game of the year tomorrow at 1 p.m. on the Mod fields.

we need to try something new—because our players are not receiving these things under the current system.

As things stand now, Bucknell has a dysfunctional football team because its athletes are not being directed in a healthy manner.

This is not to say that personnel problems are not partially to blame for the Bison's combined 4-15 record over this and last year. With such injuries as those to starting quarterback/punter Travis Kopp '95 and a lack of depth at critical skill positions, after all, a rocky road should have been expected this fall.

Even so, it is difficult to believe that our gridiron fortunes have been so woeful recently because these players just happen to be particularly worse than their counterparts in the Patriot League. Bucknell has won the President's Cup for the last two years and has already claimed two league titles in cross country and tennis this fall, so how believable is it that the football squad as a group is less able in its specific field than anyone else on campus? This argument simply doesn't hold water.

Thus, the problem must be one of leadership. The play-calling you will see in Christy Mathewson Stadium tomorrow against Lafayette is apt to be predictable, overly conservative, and resistant to adaptation in regards to the flow of the game. The players realize this, and that is one of the main sources of their frustration. They tell me that there is a pervasive feeling among them that they're behind the eight ball before they even step onto the grass.

When the captain of a ship does not have the confidence of his crew, no one feels any interest in even leaving the port. So it is with Bucknell's football team. Give back to these players an innovative, dynamic, and motivational way of coaching, and a winning program will eventually follow.

So will the fun.

five punts a game, that adds up to about 35 extra yards in field position for the opposition.

Anderson's reception got Bucknell back to 24-9 (the two-point conversion failed), but Lehigh retaliated about six minutes later with a quick one-play drive.

On first down, Semptimphelter, working out of the shotgun, found Kevin Rubin for a 58-yard scoring strike.

The Engineers scored on their next drive as well, after taking over at midfield after Glus was intercepted. The Bison were then able to use up most of the last five minutes of the contest as Walsh capped a 14-play drive with a one-yard touchdown plunge.

Maranzana reacted to the 38-16 loss by saying, "We played sound overall—we just didn't get the swarm and coverage that we needed. There were five or six big plays that went against us, and we weren't able to get them back. The blocked punt really hurt us—it took any momentum we had away."

It does not get any easier for the Bison tomorrow as they face Patriot League-leader Lafayette (6-3) here at Mathewson Stadium at 1 p.m. The Leopards took a major step toward their second league title as they knocked off three-time defending champion Holy Cross 15-6 in Easton last Saturday.

The Bison will have to figure out a way to shut down one of the most high-powered offenses in Division I-AA. Prior to last week, Lafayette had scored at least 31 points in six consecutive games, and it figures to resume that streak tomorrow against the exploitable Bucknell defense. Quarterback Tom Kirchhoff has thrown for 2,003 yards and 20 touchdowns this season.

Last year at Lafayette, the Bison were defeated 20-16 despite a 304-yard passing day by Travis Kopp, who was making his first collegiate start. Five turnovers and two missed field goals killed Bucknell in the closely-fought contest.

Now remember if you're ever surrounded by five people, simply bite one of them.

Eating with more than hunger in mind

Vegetarians and vegans unite to eat their way into a healthier, more humane world

BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Many feel that vegetarian eating has long been a health advantage. Fact is, vegetarians as a group have lower blood pressure than meat-eaters. But why would one decide to become a vegetarian? Are these benefits really worth the change of lifestyle which accompanies vegetarian eating? And are these the only benefits?

In addition to improved physical health, however, most vegetarians do have other reasons for not eating meat. Issues surrounding animal rights and the less-than-ethical treatment of animals in our nation's food production industry may even be the most significant reason why people begin a vegetarian diet.

"I first became a vegetarian after reading the book published by PETA (People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals) and I decided to stop eating meat," remarked Carolyn Haller, '96. "I don't believe in eating animals at all, and it's a protest against the harsh treatment of animals which are raised for slaughter."

Today, most animals raised for food are crowded into pens and cages and fed large amounts of antibiotics to counter the diseases that run rampant under these conditions. They are often subjected to cruel practices, i.e. the beaks of hens are painfully cut off with hot irons so that they won't peck each other to death in their close confinements.

Environmental concerns also play a large role in one's decision to become a vegetarian. Forests throughout the world are destroyed in order to make room for cattle grazing, which eventually yields to soil erosion, a dearth of natural habitat for indigenous animals, and less oxygen due to less oxygen-producing trees. Much of the rainforest destruction is engendered by the need for grazing land. Between 1960 and 1985, 40% of all Central American rainforests were destroyed to create pasture for beef cattle.

"I became a vegetarian for mostly political reasons," noted Lari Bishop '94. "There is so much degredation caused by deforestation that I felt that it was almost my responsiblitiy to stop eating meat."

The issue of human starvation is also a factor in many people's decision. It takes 16 pounds of grain to produce a pound of beef. And the U.S. livestock population consumes enough grain and soybeans each year to feed more than five times the entire U.S. population: 1.3 billion people. Reducing the amount of meat one eats by about 10% would mean 12 million more tons of grain to feed humans—enough to feed each of the 60 million people who starve to death each year.

Those who do decide upon vegetarianism as a way of life, maintain that their life has changed in some ways. "Eating is a ritual, and when you change what you eat, you change that ritual," said Joel Wainwright '95. "Becoming a vegetarian has made me slow down a lot and think more about what I eat and what I do. I have a lot more energy now than I ever did, and I feel a lot healthier."

As a rule, our society does not provide as much meal diversity for vegetarians. There are health-food stores and restaurants which cater to vegetarian eating, but often people are forced to shop for food in stores located a further distance from their homes, simply because supermarkets don't carry many soybean products or "meatless" meat.

"I often shop at Walden Acres because they carry soy milk and dairy products," continued Wainwright. "But I call veganism (strict vegetarianism) a privileged decision because the food is more expensive then regular food. On the other hand, giving up only meat is actually cheaper when you compare the cost of broccoli to a steak. And broccoli has just as much protein as the steak."

Especially at Bucknell, a vegetarian with a meal plan is relegated to the salad bar in the cafe, or simply becomes intimate with the flavor nuances of the vegetarian lasagna. For first-year students this can be particularly difficult.

Comments Ken Urban '96,"I was incredibly disappointed with the food in the cafe. In all the literature that was sent to me before I arrived at Bucknell I got the impression that vegetarians were actually quite common here, and that there would be a good selection of food to choose from. That definitely isn't the case, and although I'm better able to cope with the situation now, I was very hungry for the first week of school."

It seems that not eating those foods which are touted as "good for you" does not affect vegetarians. "I read a lot of books about nutrition when I started three years ago," commented lacto-ovo vegetarian Haller. "And I believe that I'm eating a lot more nutritiously now than I was before I gave up meat. I don't ever consider going back and eating meat."

Wainwright added that he would also never go back on meat,"Veganism has such a small support group, and I do end up eating some dairy products out of necessity, but I always know where my heart is. And I've made a conscious decision to say that this is important to me."

Common types of vegetarianism

Pure or strict vegetarian diet (also known as vegan): Excludes all foods of animal origin—meat, poultry, fish, eggs, and all dairy products.

Lacto-ovo vegetarian diet: Excludes meat, poultry, and fish, but includes eggs and dairy products of various types.

Lacto-vegetarian diet: Excludes meat, poultry, fish, and eggs; but includes dairy products of various types

What the health is going on?

BY JOYCE DOLLINGER
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Lately there has been a cholesterol mania. Everyone talks about it: doctors, the media and students. Yet, there are many misconceptions about what cholesterol is, what cholesterol numbers are, and what foods are high in cholesterol.

Cholesterol, located in all body cells, is a soft molecule made of fat. It comes from two sources: your body and foods made from animals. Your body creates 80% of your total cholesterol in the liver and uses it for cell membranes, hormones, and other bodily tissues. The fat sources from animals are: egg yolks, organ meats, fatty meats, and whole milk dairy products. Cholesterol is necessary for bodily functions, so small amounts of it are beneficial for you. It is when you eat too much of it that problems occur.

Cholesterol is one of the four main fats: saturated, polysaturated, monounsaturated and cholesterol. The first three are fatty acids and cholesterol is a fat-like substance. Of the fatty acids, only saturated fats raise blood cholesterol and polyunsaturated fatty acids lower blood cholesterol.

Cholesterol travels from cell to cell through the bloodstream by special carriers called lipoproteins since fat can not dissolve in blood. There are two lipoproteins that are important to discuss. The first one is the low density lipoprotein which is very dangerous for the body. Most of the LDL circulate in the bloodstream and slowly build up on the inner walls of the arteries, which are attached to the heart and feed blood to the heart. This cholesterol and other substances create plaque, a thick, hard coating that clogs arteries in the heart. This procedure, atherosclerosis, can lead to a heart attack or stroke. It has never been proven that cholesterol directly causes atherosclerosis, but it is highly likely.

The second category of lipoproteins is the high-density lipoprotein which carries 1/4 to 1/3 of blood cholesterol. HDL is produced by the liver and some doctors believe that HDL tends to carry cholesterol away from the arteries and back to the liver. Others think that HDL removes excess cholesterol from the plaque build-up and thus lowers the risk of heart attacks or strokes. But, a low level of HDL has negative effects as well.

Starting at age twenty, it is important to check your cholesterol levels about every five years. When a physician measures your cholesterol levels in your blood, s/he can also measure the amounts of HDL and blood fat or triglycerides to calculate your amount of LDL. These together measure your risk of atherosclerosis. A high triglyceride level means higher total cholesterol and LDL-cholesterol level, and a lower HDL-cholesterol.

Using the total blood cholesterol account, American men usually consume 450 milligrams of cholesterol a day and women around 320. The American Heart Association recommends a daily intake of cholesterol below 300 mg. You can do this by eating low-fat foods such as fruits, vegetables, whole grains, lean and skinless meats, and low-fat or skim milk. Also, in the future watch for the synthetic fats, Olestra and Simplese, that taste, feel, and act like real fats. They might have a significant impact on the health of Americans.

If you have any questions about cholesterol, call Jan Baylor at Student Health Services.

The dark side of a cultural obsession

BY JENN COOK

At one time or another, we've all seen one of those afternoon TV specials that preach the evils of crash-dieting and resorting to extreme weight-loss measures. The scene is vividly set in a cramped bathroom. A petite blond is applying another layer of high gloss lip shine and laughing at her not-so-petite friend. "Got the urge to purge, Bessy?" she laughs. But is it all that funny?

Anorexia nervosa, bulimia nervosa and compulsive overeating are three types of eating disorders that plague college campuses and are no laughing matter. As many as 1 in 100 females between 12 and 18 years of age develop anorexia, and by their first year of college, 4.5 to 18 percent of women and .4 percent of men have a history of bulimia.

Anorexics are usually thin to the point of emaciation and are afraid to gain weight. General symptoms of this weight disorder are dry skin and hair, cold hands and feet, general weakness, constipation and digestive problems, insomnia, and amenorrhea (loss of menstrual periods).

Bulimics, however, are typically of average or slightly above average weight. A bulimic will go on an eating binge, only to purge afterwards by self-induced vomiting, abusing laxatives and diuretics, or fasting or over-exercising in order to lose the gained weight. This eating disorder causes medical problems such as dehydration, constipation and digestive disorders, severe dental problems and weakness.

Compulsive overeaters are commonly overweight and may become obese. With weight increase, they may begin to suffer from shortness of breath, high blood pressure, or joint problems. In extreme cases, this disorder can cause heart and gall bladder disease and diabetes.

Experts hypothesize that a cause of these eating disorders may be the belief that in America, thinner is better. Some young women feel abnormally pressured to be as thin as the "ideal" portrayed by magazines, movies and television.

College campuses are the prime areas affected by anorexia, bulimia, and overeating. Because so many students (mostly female) are obsessed with fitting in and looking like their thinner counterparts, they resort to desperate measures to maintain what they think is the ideal weight. Preoccupation with appearance and body image, and the cultural obsession with obesity and weight control deeply affect the people that suffer from these disorders.

Some female students try a "reasoning" method to explain why they either do not eat or overeat and purge. For example, if a student spent the weekend partying and drinking alcohol, she may decide to only eat salad for a week to even out the amount of weight she gained over the weekend.

Other students who are experiencing severe stress may overeat as a form of release, then purge to rid themselves of the extra food.

Sporadic eating habits, alcohol, stress and obsession with appearance are all factors that affect a student's self-image and could lead to a detrimental eating disorder. If you have an eating disorder, or want to help someone who does, contact Student Health Services.

The Farmer's Market: A haven for health

BY ALISA BLAND
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Tired of the same food day after day, week after week? Does the thought of eating in the cafeteria or the Bison make your cholesterol level cringe? Do you want to eat something that could actually be in one of the five basic food groups? Though you won't find the Bart Butterfinger group, the Farmer's Market off Route 45 offers just about every wholesome fruit, vegetable, meat and in between for anyone looking for a nutritious alternative to the same cafe catastrophies.

Specializing in fresh, home-grown fruits and vegetables, the Farmer's Market is a change of pace for the average malnourished college student. Kristy Schiano '95, a frequent customer of the Farmer's Market, said "The food is great and cheap—it's perfect for a college budget."

Vegetarians also appreciate the variety and quality of foods offered at the Farmer's Market. "The food you find there is cheaper and more organically grown than what you would find at the grocery store," said Jocelyn Perot '94, a vegetarian. Perot said that vegetarians often cannot find alternative items to supplement protein into their diets, but the Farmer's Market offers a large selection of dried beans, cheeses, breads, homemade pasta and fresh herbs to offset the lack of vitamins, minerals and proteins.

As the seasons change, the selection at the Farmer's Market changes. If a certain item is not in season, and vendors at the market no longer carry it, the item can be special ordered.

So, if you are in the mood for something different at your next meal and the thought of pizza makes you nauseous, wake up your taste buds at the Farmer's Market.

Mystery calories add up

BY CARISSA ITLE

Drop that slice of pizza and take a look at this week's menu. Those little numbers that appear next to the food items are almost as big a mystery as what makes "supreme sauce" supreme.

So what do those numbers represent? The first number is the calorie content of one serving, followed by the grams of fat in the food item. What does this mean to your typical Bucknellian? It means that with every Bison burger you inhale, you are getting a bonus of 550 calories and 26 grams of fat.

If you'd rather have the lighter dish of tuna fish, the calorie count drops to 173 with 16 grams of fat. Or what about the ultimate fast snack, bagels? A plain bagel, sans cream cheese or butter, is 150 calories and a mere 2 grams of fat.

Those lovely little side snacks like french fries (126 calories), potato chips (160 calories) and nachos with cheese (173 calories) make even the most guilt free eater a bit wary of the evils of late-night snacking.

The average diet is about 2000 calories a day, or 12 and a half servings of potato chips or about 3 and a half Bison burgers. So the next time you read the caf menu, before relishing in the sheer delight of seeing your favorite dish, remember that there is some use for the mystery numbers that are beside them.

The great dilemma: where to eat today?

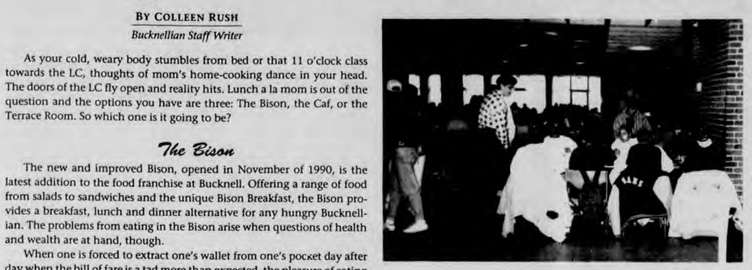
BY COLLEEN RUSH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As your cold, weary body stumbles from bed or that 11 o'clock class towards the LC, thoughts of mom's home-cooking dance in your head. The doors of the LC fly open and reality hits. Lunch a la mom is out of the question and the options you have are three: The Bison, the Caf, or the Terrace Room. So which one is it going to be?

The Bison

The new and improved Bison, opened in November of 1990, is the latest addition to the food franchise at Bucknell. Offering a range of food from salads to sandwiches and the unique Bison Breakfast, the Bison provides a breakfast, lunch and dinner alternative for any hungry Bucknellian. The problems from eating in the Bison arise when questions of health and wealth are at hand, though.

When one is forced to extract one's wallet from one's pocket day after day when the bill of fare is a tad more than expected, the pleasure of eating in the Bison soon diminishes. The price of convenience for items in the convenient store, a handy adaptation to the express-mart, are on the average ten to twenty cents higher than those in a regular grocery store. A full meal from the Bison is also a bit pricey. For the healthy appetite, a turkey club sandwich at $3.25, a side of cajun fries for $1.25, a medium yogurt for dessert at $1.48, and a medium soft drink for $.70 to wash it all down adds up to an even healthier $6.70. For the few Bucknellians who know the value of money, eating in the Bison adds up, and at those prices, one might find it cheaper, though not easier, to cook for oneself.



Deb Hildebrandt—The Bucknellian

Students gather around tables in the caf to take part in a campus dining experience. The caf offers variety, as well as mystery.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Jean Jerz '95 serves Buffy Ayres '93 in the Bison. Eating in the Bison can be an expensive but, sometimes needed break from caf food.

If money is not the concern when eating at the Bison, health certainly should be. It is easy to get caught in the habit of eating those tempting terrible delights like the Bison Breakfast. Your arteries should be screaming for mercy at the sight of eggs, cheese and bacon in one forbidden sandwich. If grease is a problem, stick to sandwiches and salads because almost everything else is a veritable smorgasbord of fat, grease, cholesterol and all the other evil words in the health dictionary. If you can trust yourself to eat more bagels and salads and less cheesesteaks and Bison burgers, eating wisely and staying healthy should not be a problem.

Overall, the Bison is a good place to treat yourself to now and then, especially if you need a quick food fix. The menu, which hasn't changed much since the Bison opened, does get old after a few meals and isn't necessarily a treat for the bank account or body.

The caf

The Roy Grier Bostwick Memorial Cafeteria is the place where many students choose to dine. Offering a menu that repeats every four weeks, the caf has the most diverse menu of all options available on campus. The caf is sure to provide some kind of meal for even the pickiest eater with one and sometimes two entrees available. There is also host of cereals, a salad bar, and fixings for PB and J's or tuna fish sandwiches. For the hungry Bucknellian, second or third helpings are welcomed. A meal plan even cuts out the financial woes that eating in the Bison or off campus can cause.

The caf, however, is not without its faults. Figuring out the mystery meat of the day can be an eye-opening and stomach turning experience. Flavor is not always an option when eating in the caf and things that go crunch in mashed potatoes are not worth questioning.

The taste variable often seems low on the totem pole of priorities, but there are a few sacred meals in the caf that students like. Chicken burgers, grilled cheese sandwiches, vegetarian and meat lasagna are just a few menu items that bring a smile to a student's face.

For the early riser who actually makes it to the caf in time, breakfast is usually a bearable eating experience. Homemade doughnuts, cereals, muffins and biscuits are a few accessories to the entrees of breakfast. The main course, however, is usually not the greatest way to start a day. Aside from the Sunday Eggs Benedict, breakfast entrees usually have that just-out-of-the-freezer taste.

For the most part, the caf experience is a livable one. Mass feedings for hundreds of hungry Bucknellians can't substitute a tantalizing dinner for two at the Ritz; but what other school offers lobster or filet mignon at their Christmas dinner? The caf's applaudable effort of feeding Bucknellians is a success so far and no one has died from it yet.

The Terrace Room

Ahh, the Terrace Room. That aesthetically pleasing place to eat, socialize and be merry. Where else can you go for lettuce that isn't brown, real sliced deli meat, fresh bread and soup? And who could pass up the ambiance of the Terrace Room? With music piped into the eatery and huge glass windows enclosing the whole little Terrace Room world. Why eat anywhere else?

Leane Hood—The Bucknellian

Despite lacking variety, the Terrace Room is a prime spot for the health conscious.

The Terrace Room is open five days a week during lunch and on some evenings for students to graze as they please. Health and nutrition are top of the line here. A fully stocked salad bar and an equally plentiful sandwich bar are the main courses offered in this euphoria of good food. A variety of fresh fruits are always available and a yogurt machine serving low- and non-fat yogurt is now on tap.

What could be wrong with a nutritious haven like this? Variety. After two or three days of salads and sandwiches, the Bison eating syndrome sets in and the average eater may begin to wonder if there is more to life than lettuce and turkey. For the not-so-average, weight-watching, lettuce-loving student, though, the Terrace Room is heaven on earth. The best way to take advantage of such a vital resource like Terrace Room is to go once or twice a week to insure a healthy diet with a little variety.

Wherever the hungry Bucknellian chooses to eat on or off campus, there are, despite many complaints, alternative feeding holes to please the palate.

Crunchy foods for crunchy people

BY NANCY NORBECK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

If you're hungry and you want something a little unusual, the Natural Food and Garden Store may be the place for you. The store offers various kinds of natural and organically grown foods in addition to other health- conscious products.

Owner Chris Snyder and his wife, Kate Lesslie, opened the store in March of 1980. "Having grown up in the 60s, I wanted to sell the kinds of things I believed in," said Snyder. "I wanted to make vegetarian and other foods available to myself and others."

Originally, the store just sold natural and whole grain foods. Since then, the interest in natural foods has grown, and Snyder has modified his stock to reflect that change. "Oat bran really opened the door to a lot of people who got interested in natural foods," Snyder said. "It was the first time a lot of people made the connection between food and health. Sometimes you can use diet to affect your health instead of drugs."

Snyder sells vitamins and sports supplements, as well as snacks, pastas, herbal teas and coffees. "We sell a lot of snacks to students," Snyder said. He has begun to stock more fat-free foods in response to the demand of students and local residents. The store also features other ecologically friendly items, such as organic gardening supplies and cleaning products that will not harm the earth.

The prices for some items, such as nuts, are significantly lower in the Natural Food and Garden Store than they would be elsewhere. Some of the more substantial choices are more expensive, however, due to their higher quality.

Have you ever wondered . . . . . who decides the caf menu?

BY CARYN AKELAITIS
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Have you ever noticed the trend in the cafeteria menu? Or wondered who decides that Tuesday is chicken nugget night and Friday is grilled cheese and tomato soup day?

The production manager, chef, and Director of Dining Services, Henry Ross, is responsible for determining the menu. "The menu repeats itself every four weeks," stated Ross. "We have reduced the menu to the more popular items and eliminated things such as liver and meatloaf that were not very popular."

Student suggestions are very important to the cafeteria staff and the suggestion box located at the entrance of the caf is just one way of getting student input. Responses to suggestions, comments and questions submitted to the cafeteria are posted outside the main entrance. "We are aware of the students' nutritional needs as well as their likes and dislikes," said Ross. "Their suggestions are very important. The cafeteria is not profit driven; it is here to provide the best food for the least amount of cost. We are always looking for new recipes."

Future plans for the cafeteria are in the making, including more food options, longer breakfast hours, changing the Terrace Room into a food court area, and a possible remodeling of the dining room.

Commentary
The fire is almost out

Last Sunday evening I received a call from a Bucknell football booster from Shamokin Dam.

Over the course of our 20-minute conversation, I found out that this man was a member of the Bison and Touchdown Clubs, and that he regularly made contributions to the team where he could—including financial ones.

He went on to say that he had talked to players, students and trainers because he was suddenly of the mind that something was markedly wrong with our squad, and he needed answers. This was no haughty armchair quarterback, though—just a concerned and disappointed fan.

The problem was, he felt moved to call me because he didn't seem to know who else to turn to. You see, his role as a Bucknell football supporter wasn't fun anymore.

In my talks with members of the faculty and administration, the subject of the football team has also come up. They tell me that it's difficult to sit and watch as the squad gets blown out on Parents Weekend by an 0-7 team. They tell me that Bucknell's performance this season is having a negative effect on how people look at the University's overall athletics program. They tell me that things are going sour fast.

They are not having fun, either.

Finally, I have talked with the players themselves this week. I heard stories of lost faith in the program and of being burned out, and their comments were uncanny in how they mirrored one another. Some said they don't want to return to action next year, while even more admitted that they do not care whether they win, lose, or tie next week—they just want the damn season to be over.

They certainly are not having fun.

Truth to tell, these problems may have existed in some form or another for a few years now at Lewisburg, but never to the extent that they have reached this season. Morale is at a shockingly low level on the football squad in the midst of this 3-6 year, and so the following question must be asked: Why? It must come down to the fact that the team isn't winning games, right?

Wrong—totally wrong.

The reason that the Bison football program should be examined in the coming months should have nothing to do with our winning percentage, but rather that our athletes are currently not getting the benefits out of the program that they should be.

Call me idealistic, but every college sports program should be measured by its ability to encourage students to excel at their game, to learn, and to grow as people. For this to take place, though, the bond between the coaching staff and the squad must be strong.

Unfortunately, such a bond does not exist on our football team.

Rather, the majority of players will only come away from this season frustrated and uncertain whether they want to ever play again at Bucknell. Who can blame them? There are only scant traces of team unity, players feel as if they don't have enough of a say in the program's direction, and confidence in their coach is severely lacking.

Questions about coach Lou Maranzana's performance with the program, then, seem to arise. This is certainly a difficult issue to deal with, for the University is holding a man's very career and livelihood in its hands. His future with the Bison football program should not be taken lightly.

Nevertheless, something must be changed to put an end to this disarray. A coach never should be either hired or fired based solely on winning percentage, but rather on how well he can motivate, inspire, and teach his charges. This is why

Women's volleyball continues losing ways

Bison leave NY with losses to Vermont and Columbia, travel to Worcester, MA, for Patriot League tourney

BY ERIC BIRNBAUM, PETER LALOS AND LARNIE J. BOOKER
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Last Saturday, the women's volleyball team looked to take a bite out of the Big Apple, as well as its opponents, Columbia and Vermont, as it rounded out its regular reason schedule. Going into the weekend with a 4-20 record, the squad looked to fine-tune its skills in preparation for this weekend's Patriot League Tournament at Holy Cross.

Yet, after its performance in New York, another tune-up might be in order for the Bison. It became obvious early on that with the loss of freshman sensation Katie Steele to an ankle injury, Bucknell would not be as effective.

> "We're struggling right now. I do however see some good things out there. With a few adjustments I feel that we will be alright in the [Patriot League] tournament."
> —Head coach Cindy Opalski

In the first match versus Vermont, the Spikers came out strong and focused but still fell 15-10. This was not the case in the two succeeding games, though, as Vermont wasted no time and crushed the Orange and Blue quickly and emphatically, 15-2, 15-1.

"We were slow in the beginning and we couldn't get it going. We weren't mentally prepared," said co-captain Aubrey Schneggenburger '95. "However, I think we could have beaten them if we were focused."

The team needed to steadfastly put the defeat to Vermont behind it and concentrate on its next foe from the Ivy League—Columbia. Would the Lady Spikers be able to adjust adequately enough to show its true caliber against their opponents in blue and white?

Early on, it appeared that they would. The team came out fired up and took the first game of the match, 15-10. With a head of steam, the Bison set their sights on the next game. In the second stanza things got very close and emotion ran high on both sides of the net. Columbia, using its home-court advantage, prevailed in the extended game and won 16-14.

After this tough loss Bucknell tried to regroup and catch its breath. Unfortunately for the players, it took them too long and Columbia took the third and fourth games in unopposed fashion, 15-1 and 15-11.

With the absence of middle blocker Steele, Heidi Dawson '95 picked up the slack by playing at the high caliber that her teammates needed. The sophomore tallied for 13 kills and a .320 attack percentage for the four-game match. Schneggenburger continued to play well as she also put away 13 kills, picked up two service aces, one block and five digs.

"We're struggling right now," said head coach Cindy Opalski. "I do, however, see some good things out there. With a few adjustments I feel that we will be alright in the [Patriot League] tournament."

Looking ahead to tomorrow's tourney, Bucknell will head into play in Worchester seeded sixth. In the first round the Spikers will go up against the third-seeded Red Raiders of Colgate, who finished up this year at 17-11 and third in league play, compiling a 4-3 record.

Colgate beat Bucknell in three games during the month of October, and is riding a two-game winning streak at the expense of Dartmouth (3-2) and Hartford (3-0).

"I am looking forward to the Patriot League Championships," said Opalski. "Our goal is to go into the tournament and come away with a win. I think we can do it."

The team's ability to focus and concentrate has been the needle in its side all semester. With the set-up of the double elimination tournament, any team can pull off a win. All season long, the only things that fans have heard is that the team has more potential then it has displayed. Hopefully, Bucknell will see the squad that should have been 13-8 according to Opalski and not the 4-22 team that reared its ugly head throughout the '92 campaign.

H_2O polo makes 4-0 charge at Easterns

Bison hop over .500 to finish 14-12 for 1992 campaign with victories against Queens, St. Francis, GWU and Army

BY MATT ZARTMAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This past weekend the Bucknell men's water polo team closed the book on its fall season at the Easterns in Annapolis with a perfect 4-0 showing.

Last weekend the the Bison (14-12) were disappointed in the Mid-Atlantic Conference championships when they were unable to beat Navy and receive a bid in the top bracket of the Eastern Championships. They did, however, get asked to compete in the lower bracket of that tournament, and the team was very pleased with the chance to play in one last set of matches for the 1992 campaign.

The Orange and Blue's first opponent last Saturday was Queens, a game that the team knew would be a tough win from the start.

"They played one of their best games of the year against us," said coach John Zeigler '91.

With one minute left in the game the Bison found themselves down by a goal, 7-6, but they did have possession of the ball. The squad called a timeout before the last minute of play, and this move proved wise as the Bison were then able to regroup and score two goals in the last minute of regulation to win the game in dramatic fashion, 8-7.

The second game of the day was against a weaker St. Francis team, who Bucknell handled easily by a score of 12-2.

"We dominated the game from start to finish," said coach Zeigler of the decisive victory.

The third game was very similar to the St. Francis match as the Bison cruised to another lopsided victory against George Washington, 10-4.

"It was a similar type of game as the previous one. We shut down their offense, and throughout both the games we had a good balanced attack," said Zeigler of the satisfying triumph.

One game stood between the young Bison squad and a sweep of the weekend, but it would not be as easy as the previous two blowouts. The final opponent for Bucknell was going to be Army, a team that the Bison had lost to last weekend at the MAC tournament in Princeton, 11-7. The Bison were looking to avenge the loss to the Cadets and end the season on a positive note.

"We came out fired up in the first quarter and built a three-to-one lead," Zeigler recalls of the match. "The rest of the game turned into a defensive battle."

In the fourth quarter, however, the strong Bison defense snapped and gave up two goals while seeing its offensive guns fall silent, and the Cadets tied the game at five. The match then went into overtime, and the offense cranked up for the Bison and scored three unanswered goals. The scoring flurry gave Bucknell an 8-5 victory, and revenge was theirs.

Looking at the weekend as a whole, Zeigler was very impressed with his team because "they [the players] were able to get past the disappointment of last weekend, and a lot of the younger players got to show their talents."

Now that his first-ever season as head coach is over, Zeigler is looking forward to this young team's future.

"I'm very pleased with our record, especially considering that we graduated most of the starters from last year," Zeigler said. Although the squad will graduate only two players this coming spring, they are very important ones to the team—seniors Steve Benson '93 and Chris Retzler '93.

"It will be tough losing them because Steve Benson is one of the biggest players that we have, and he is an excellent hole man. Chris Retzler is one of our best defensive players, and he also has one of the best shots on the team," the coach explained.

Despite the upcoming losses in personnel, Zeigler is still very confident about the future.

"I think that the underclassmen will do a good job filling in next year. They have gained a lot of experience this year which will help them," Zeigler said. "All the younger guys got their feet wet this season, and next year we will be ready to win some more games."

With the large crop of experienced first-year players on its roster, Bucknell can expect to peak in performance within the next three years of its Mid-Atlantic Conference play.

Basketball ticket system revised

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Recent renovations of Davis Gym have allowed for more seats than last year but standing room has been limited by law, thereby reducing the actual number of people who will be admitted to the gym, according to Rick Hartzell, director of physical education and athletics.

According to a report by James McCormick, Safety Manager of the Department of Public Safety, the fixed seating in Davis Gym will allow for 2,016 available tickets.

Safety hazards arose last year when fans over-crowded the gym space, exceeding the 2,500-person capacity.

The occupancy limits of the gym are governed by the Pennsylvania Department of Labor and Industry and the Union County Housing Authority.

An additional 202 tickets are allowed for the "standing room."

The difference between the maximum occupancy (2,500) and the number of tickets available to the public (2,218) must be reserved for players, coaches, trainers, cheerleaders, ushers and security officers.

Hartzell made a proposal to the Bucknell Student Government last Sunday concerning the basketball ticket situation at Davis Gym, opening the floor for suggestions or recommendations from students.

The process of distributing tickets to the campus community had to be revised because of the increased enforcement of the gym's occupancy limits.

According to Hartzell's proposal, a limited number of reserved seat season tickets will be available to the public and the faculty and staff. These sales are not to exceed five hundred tickets.

Students, faculty and staff would then be able to obtain one of the 1,639 tickets remaining free of charge with their Bucknell I.D.

These tickets, Hartzell proposed, would be picked up at the Langone Center box office in the days prior to the game, but after the previous game.

One ticket will be allowed per identification card for all students, faculty and staff.

The Athletic Department would then put on sale any general admission tickets that were not picked up prior to game day, allowing that students could still pick up a ticket with their I.D. on game night.

However, BSG recommended that the Athletic Department not put tickets for sale to the general public until tip-off of the game.

This amendment to the proposal, said BSG President Mike Thomas '94, would keep more tickets available for students, who should be the top priority.

"Basketball is one of the few sports that generates a significant amount of school spirit," Thomas said. "If Bucknell wants to provide an atmosphere that is conducive to school spirit, it should give students a signal that we are of high priority."

BSG also asked that Hartzell report back to them after the first game when the system is implemented. Hartzell took these suggestions into consideration, but had

Edward, the Grand Champion of the Virginia Poultry Breeders Festival, is a bit different from his near relatives who will find themselves on the plates of millions of thanks-giving Americans this Thursday.

According to Assistant Professor of Management Skip McGoun, turkeys like Edward, known as "Bourbon Reds" are members of a natural breed that has been in the United States since colonial times. McGoun breeds these birds to preserve the gene pools of such natural lines of the traditional Thanksgiving bird. McGoun said that turkeys like Edward are threatened because birds produced for eating are genetically altered to produce more meat.

In addition to his status as prize-winning poultry, Edward and the McGouns' other feathered friends also serve as pets. This gives the birds an especially friendly disposition. "He was the only turkey at the Bloomsburg Fair who would let people pet him," said McGoun. Edward will travel to Richmond this weekend to compete in another poultry competition.

CDC goes high-tech with "Career Search"

BY DEB MANASSE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

With visions of poverty dancing in their heads, seniors have begun to face the daunting task of planning for a future outside the bubble. To aid students in the search for a job, the Career Development Center has gone state-of-the-art with the purchase of a computer database system known as "Career Search".

The system provides a massive directory of employers from a wide range of fields, providing addresses, phone numbers, contact names, descriptions, and measures of success for each firm.

"This is a breakthrough product for career research," said Joan Beck, Assistant Director of the Career Development Center.

The system covers 183,000 companies in 19 industries and can produce searches that are as broad as nationwide or as narrow as within five miles of a specific ZIP code.

Among the first 10 colleges to use "Career Search," Bucknell has gotten a jump start on most university career centers. This distinction means that career finders are listening to what members of the Bucknell Career Development Center are saying about the selection of additional databases.

"The reason we were so eager to jump on board early was to persuade the service to buy databases that are of interest to our liberal arts majors," said Beck. "We have suggested professional and trade associations and non-profits. This is what our people want and these are good places for our students to work."

According to Beck, one the system's biggest strengths is its ability to pinpoint smaller firms that are sometimes difficult to locate through traditional searches.

"Eighty percent of new jobs are being created by companies with less than 100 employees," said Beck. "That is what this program is really good for— finding those smaller firms."

The database is updated every month to ensure that it is current. "Anytime one of the directories is updated we get it," said Beck. "It comes to us before it goes to the libraries."

In addition, Beck stressed that since the program asks the user to customize his or her search by supplying information on desired company characteristics, "Career Search" provides a means of helping students develop answers to some common questions they must begin to consider.

"Students need to start thinking about where they want to locate, what kinds of employers they are interested in applying to, and what it is they want to do within a particular business," said Beck. "The nature of this program forces students to make those kinds of choices."

Students may sign up in the Career Development Center to try the system which is free of charge for on-campus use.

And, to ensure that the computer is not monopolized by the panicking seniors who will probably account for the majority of its use, one hour a day will be reserved for administrators and faculty to utilize the system.

Although the computer is primarily intended for students, Beck anticipates that appeal for the program will extend beyond present members of the campus community.

"I think that it will also be popular for off-campus alumni who will be able to use it for a small fee," said Beck.

According to Beck, a fee of $25 will cover a year of searches during the first year after a student graduates. After that the charge will be $25 per search.

In a continuing effort to find a job, Meghan Burns '93 and Kelly Ann Gosline '93 use the "Career Search" computer. The program was installed in the Career Development Center on October 28.

Trustees vote to increase tuition

BY DAVID BARRY AND JAMIE DIAFERIA
Bucknellian Staff Writers

The Board of Trustees voted last weekend for a 7.4% comprehensive fee increase that will take effect next school year, according to Ellis Harley, Vice-President of Finance.

Harley said the increase was necessitated by a need to keep up with the rising costs of running a university.

"The rationale does have to do with meeting the costs of educational programs at an institution such as Bucknell University," he said.

Tuition will increase by 6.4%, or $1,060, which will cover, in part, salary compensation for the faculty, administration and staff.

Compensation is derived from a pre-set formula, according to Harley.

The University takes a three year weighted average of the personal disposable income, to which 1% is added, he explained.

The fee for room and board was increased by 13.4% and 9.8% respectively. This translates into $290 and $190 apiece.

Gerald Commerford, Associate Dean of Housing, said the increase comes in an effort to compete favorably with Bucknell's frame of reference schools.

"The increase in room fees is greater than it has been in recent years, but this is equaled out by the fact that our room and board fees have been significantly lower than that of our frame of reference schools," he explained.

Harley said the University pays close attention to its frame of reference schools, specifically Lehigh, Lafayette and Colgate.

"We do look at whether we are reasonably priced within our marketplace. We look to see that we don't get out of line, but that we are below the median level of our frame of reference," he explained.

The admistration proposed a 6.7% comprehensive fee increase two years ago, but it was reduced by the Board of Trustees to a modest 4.5% increase in that year, but since then it has risen sharply.

Lee Idleman, Chairman of the Board of Trustees, said last year the school needed to keep spending in check."I think we felt that some effort to control closts was a neccessary message" two years ago, he said.

In reference to last year's increse, Idleman added, "I think having done that once that there is a little less urgency to send a message this year."

In the last two years tuition has risen an average of 7.05%.

Safe Rides accepts volunteers only

The Safe Rides program has met with great success since its inception in the fall of 1991. However, two incidents occurred in which students providing the service allegedly indulged in alcoholic beverages either before or while driving. These students were participating in the program in order to fulfill community service hours they had received as a sanction for violating a university policy .

Library to implement extended hours

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As finals period quickly approaches, students are anticipating late nights filled with study and stress. Those students who are distracted by the noise and activity in their residence halls and can't find an empty classroom now have another option.

Bertrand Library administration approved a motion from BSG last Friday that will extend library hours during reading and finals period.

"We wanted to provide not only a larger area for study but also access to more resources for an extended period of time," said Michael Thomas, BSG president.

"We felt that the current 24 hour section does not provide adequate study space for students during the reading and finals period," Thomas added.

The library will remain open until 2:00 a.m. for the nine day period of December 10-18.

> "We are planning on continuing this in the future if a significant number of students use the study space."
> —JoAnne Young, associate director of library services

This semester will serve as an experimental period allowing the library administration to determine if it is beneficial to continue to extend library hours in the future.

The evaluation will be based on the actual number of students using the library as well as an assessment of the study atmosphere.

"We are planning on continuing this in the future if a significant number of students use the study space," said JoAnne Young, associate director of library services. "We are not looking for a specific number of students," said Young.

Deductible increase approved

BY CATHY DARRUP
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The Board of Trustees approved a $150 increase per person in the Blue Cross/Blue Shield Major Medical deductible last week, which raises the deductible from $100 to $250.

The decision comes as a surprise to the faculty, according to sociology professor Matthew Silberman, since they had originally suggested only a $50 increase, rather than the $150 increase that was approved by the Trustees.

"Faculty and faculty committees deliberated this issue at our meetings," Silberman said. "The outcome was a recommendation that very little be changed in the University's health care system until the campus had a more widespread discussion and opportunity for reasonable input. The faculty agreed to a $50 increase, not $150. [The Trustees' decision] is a surprise. I don't think anyone really knew that this was happening."

But Silberman points out that the $150 increase is really not as bad as it originally appears. He said that Bucknell had previously covered 80% of the extra $150 that employees will now pay, so "really it's only an extra $120 increase per person for the first two members of a family" that need medical attention. After the first $250 of the bill, Bucknell will cover 80% of the expenses up to $2000. After the $2000 point, Bucknell will cover 100% of the expenses.

As a result of the higher deductible that the employees will now pay, the University will pay a lower Major Medical premium. "There has been a concern about who should pay for medical coverage, the University or the employees," Silberman said. "There has been pressure to shift more of the cost to the employees." The new plan reflects this pressure.

Also as a consequence of the Trustees' decision, Geisinger Health Plan (GHP) has removed the $8.00 prescription drug rider that was originally offered. There will now be no prescription drug coverage available with the GHP plan as of January 1, 1993. There will be no charge to the faculty and staff for GHP coverage for 1993.

Hartzell is also considering having all home games televised throughout campus on the campus cable system and in the Bison.

If there is a huge interest in a particular game, a screen could be set up in the Fieldhouse so that more students could watch it there.

The Bison basketball team opens their season Saturday, November 28 when they host the Ukranian National Team. Tip-off is set for 7:30 p.m.

The first regular season game will be held on Tuesday, December 1 at Davis Gym.

The Breakin' Bison will face Mount St. Mary's.

Soon the seats in Davis Gym will be packed with fans cheering for the Breakin' Bison. 1,639 seats will be available for students, faculty and staff. The first regular season home game will be held Dec. 1.

Students John Dunlop has stated that Safe Rides will no longer accept student drivers who are performing community service hours assigned to them for alcohol or other University violations.

"We will ensure to the extent that we are able," Dunlop said, "that the persons providing the service are doing it with no risk to the students using the service."

In place of those students who were doing Safe Rides as community service hours, Jenn Stevens '93, coordinator of the program, said that Safe Rides will be staffed exclusively by volunteers and students working off parking violations.

Previously the "Safe Rides" project was used to provide an option for students who are under disciplinary action.

"One of the things we require of students under disciplinary action is campus or community service," Dunlop said.

Students have participated in the "Safe Rides" program as a means of campus service.

"We had hoped that students would see they were making a contribution to the welfare and safety of other students," said Dunlop.

In light of the recent problems "we will no longer use the Safe Rides program as a means of students working off campus service projects."

"The soundness, success and safety of this program will not be jeopardized," said Dunlop.

PUBLIC SAFETY LOG

Monday, November 9

At 8:15 a.m., a secretary from the Olin Science building reported to Public Safety that unknown person(s) gained entrance into a room in Olin through a ground floor window which was not properly secured. It was discovered that a calendar book and an Elvis lamp were removed from the office. Investigation is continuing.

Friday, November 13

Officers responded at 12:13 a.m. to a report of two unregistered parties in progress at uphill fraternities. Investigation into the matter is continuing and charges are pending.

Saturday, November 14

At 12:20 a.m., officers were summoned to the Langone Center on the report of an intoxicated, unconscious person. Upon arrival, the officers discovered that the intoxicated person was a Bucknell student who was also under twenty-one years of age. Student was transported to the Department of Public Safety and was cited by the East Buffalo Police for underage drinking and public drunkenness. University charges are pending.

At 12:25 a.m. officers responded to Smith Hall on the report of an intoxicated student needing medical attention. It was discovered that the victim had consumed alcohol after taking medication. Student was transported by private vehicle to the hospital for treatment.

A student reported at 10:00 a.m. that (s)he was the victim of a harassing telephone call at Kress Hall. Investigation is continuing.

A student reported a theft to Public Safety at 8:32 p.m. She stated that sometime between 2:30 a.m. and 2:40 a.m. an unknown person(s) did remove her leather jacket from the common room at Chi Phi. The jacket was valued at $90.00.

Officers responded to Swartz Hall at 11:08 a.m. to pick up an air pistol. It was ascertained that the owner had been shooting the pistol out a door in Swartz and a Resident Assistant had confiscated the gun from the student. Charges are pending.

At 11:58 a.m., a Public Safety officer responded to the Phi Kappa Psi house on the report of an injured student. It was discovered that the victim had received a head laceration after a door was inadvertently opened toward him. The Student Health Service transported the student to the hospital for medical treatment. Student was treated and released.

Sunday, November 15

A report of a dead deer located in Swartz Hall was received by the Department of Public Safety at 7:20 a.m. Officers located the deer on a sofa in the television lounge. Unknown person(s) caused large amounts of damage to the lounge area and couch. Investigation is continuing.

Monday, November 16

A student reported at 4:42 p.m. that her vehicle was damaged sometime between 8 a.m. and 4:30 p.m. on this date. Photographs of the damage were taken.

An officer responded at 8:05 a.m. to a fire alarm in a MOD unit. A student had left a stove burner on overnight that had caught fire to pretzel box. The fire was extinguished and the alarm was reset.

Tuesday, November 17

At 1:45 p.m., Public Safety received a report of a person shooting a gun from a window in Larison Hall. Officers located the student who was responsible. An air gun was confiscated, and charges are pending.

At 5:41 p.m., a Bucknell employee reported that she had fallen off her moped after an unidentified vehicle had cut in front of her. The victim was treated at the Student Health Service for minor injuries sustained in the fall.

A student reported at 3:15 p.m. that ten T-shirts had been stolen from a closet in the Langone Center. The shirts were the property of MG101. Investigation is continuing.

Wednesday, November 18

A 10:07 a.m., a custodian reported the theft of two lamps, one coffee table, and two end tables from Hunt Hall. Investigation is continuing.

President's "Environmental Imperative" forum concludes

BY KRISTIN KLINGENBERG
Bucknellian Staff Writer

The final lectures in the President's Forum on the Environmental Imperative were given last night by two distinguished and committed environmentalists, James W. MacNeill and Robert F. Kennedy, Jr. These lectures, focusing in particular on sustainable economic development, ended a year-long series which addressed the global environmental crisis.

MacNeill, a member of the World Commission on Environment and Development and a principal author of its report, "Our Common Future," spoke to a full audience in the Langone Center Forum on environmental developments over the past two decades.

In the 1970s, he stated, "the U.S. almost invariably led on resource and environmental issues" in comparison with the rest of the world, but slowly the roles reversed with Europe and Japan taking the lead over "a reluctant U.S." He noted President-elect Clinton and Vice-President-elect Gore's indications for change in U.S. environmental policy, adding "I look forward to the U.S. resuming a positive role in international environmental issues."

Jean Auro—The Bucknellian

James MacNeill, member of the World Commission on Environment and Development, spoke to a full audience in the Langone Center Forum.

MacNeill commented on the "economic, political, and social earthquakes in the last five years" and the change in our ideas on the relationship between the economy and the environment. Whereas the "old guard" saw the environment and nature as enemies of jobs and the economy, he said, "new leaders in the world have found that. . . the environment and the economy can be made mutually reinforcing."

He stated that "the ecological and economic systems are totally and irrevocably interlocked until death do them part," calling this "the new reality of the twentieth century."

"We put the environment on the global political agenda" in Stockholm in 1971, he said, adopting a strategy of environmental protection which "focussed on the effects of environmental degradation, not on the sources." Consequently, "as we treated the symptoms of the underlying trends, the sources steadily got worse," according to MacNeill.

The next major shift in environmental policy came 16 years later, with a report that called for "sustainable development," which implies what MacNeill called "a revolution in the way we do business."

He said that the good news is that the revolution has already been occurring over the past several decades, but the bad news is that the progress, blocked by "misguided public policies and outdated institutional frameworks," is not nearly rapid enough.

Among what he termed strategic imperatives for sustainable development, MacNeill stated that the key is "to put the environment at the center of economic and political decision-making," ensuring that "market forces work for both the economy and the environment at the same time." He advocated strong policies to encourage increased energy efficiency, and to conserve and enhance renewable resources.

Concerning the Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro this past summer, MacNeill commented that although it is probably too early to assess the summit's accomplishments, an optimist would say that "Rio increased the prospects for change," while a pessimist would call the summit "a grand global photo opportunity for world leaders."

He said that the Rio summit was a "huge political success" that increased publicity and environmental awareness and reinforced the movement from environmental protection to sustainable development in our agendas.

However, there was an unfortunate lack of concrete action, as "leaders left nothing unsaid yet almost everything undone."

MacNeill claimed that in terms of the future, "we have to get from rhetoric and high-sounding declaration to action," as "the road from Rio will be much longer and more challenging than the road to Rio."

Concluding his remarks, MacNeill stated, "we are literally in command of our own future on this planet and whether we succeed or fail, the decisions and responsibility will have been ours."

Kennedy, a clinical professor and supervising attorney at the Environmental Litigation Clinic at Pace University Law School, demonstrated that he takes this responsibility seriously as he discussed his involvement in the environmental protection of the Hudson River.

He stated that the Hudson River "is a model for ecosystem protection." This is largely due to the presence of the Hudson River Keeper, a group of fisherman that act as watchdogs for the river, tracking pollutants and providing information for Pace's environmental litigation clinic. Law students working through the clinic then take on cases, suing polluters of the Hudson River.

Kennedy cited a landmark case involving the Hudson, in which the courts ruled that environmentalists have standing to sue in cases of environmental degradation. In this case, a prominent power company wanted to build a reservoir on top of Storm King Mountain which would generate electric power by sending water gathered in the reservoir down a pipeline 40 feet in diameter.

The power company claimed that the fish and other aquatic life pulled into the reservoir "would not be harmed by being dropped six times the height of Niagara Falls," according to Kennedy, at which point environmentalists stepped in to block the reservoir's construction.

Kennedy spoke in great detail about the importance of the Hudson River in terms of the marine food chain and ecological balance. He termed the river "the Noah's Ark of the North Atlantic," stating that he is "struck not only by the diversity of the species but also the abundance."

As far as the current global environmental crisis, "we are destroying 175 million years of evolution in the blink of an eye," Kennedy stated, adding that the destruction of any species is "one of the worst sins that one generation can commit against another."

Kennedy spoke of his own childhood experiences with nature, and also discussed his children who are "growing up with a different set of concerns, and these are environmental concerns."

Concerning the environmental degradation that occurs on a daily basis, he said, "we don't have a right to do this to ourselves, and we don't have a right to do this to our children."

Claiming that society as a whole is not good at looking at the long-term situation, he stated, "we become engrossed in immediate issues of the day. . . and the world that we build tends to reflect these immediate issues" rather than long-term concerns.

However, Kennedy seemed optimistic for the future, stating that he was happy to be speaking at a university, as "this is where change happens in this country and all over the world."

In terms of our own university, President Gary Sojka stated in his introduction for Kennedy that Bucknell's environmental task force, which was announced at the previous Environmental Imperative lecture, has already met and has formulated several recommendations.

President Sojka noted that this lecture series will have "a lasting impact because it has changed the way we think about things."

He added that "we owe a considerable debt to Jim Rice [assistant vice president for academic affairs and development] and a panel of faculty persons who have planned this series."

Students share experiences regarding problem drinking

BY MARIA GLOD
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Editor's Note: This article examines the issue of problem drinking on campus. Several individuals have come forward to tell their stories in an effort to educate the campus about the problems that exist and alternatives that are available. Although the names have been changed, details appear exactly as told by the individuals.

"What do you mean you can't stop; you just don't want to."

"You can't be an alcoholic because your grades are good."

"You're just a little out of hand."

Katie remembers the reactions of her friends to her drinking. To them alcohol was just part of the weekend party scene. It was easy to drink a beer or two on Saturday night and then stop. For Katie it was not that simple.

When I drink I can't control how much. I just can't stop. Alcoholics have no boundaries.

Katie's story is not uncommon.

I started drinking in high school. Once I got to Bucknell everybody did it. My behavior was accepted and everyone seemed to drink like I did.

According to Dr. Donald Stechshulte, medical director of the Zeigler Health Center, "alcohol consumption is interwoven in our social fabric and this makes it difficult for people to see it as something which can cause problems." Within the social framework of the "bubble" many students turn to partying and drinking as a means to escape from the rigors of the classroom.

> "Alcohol consumption is interwoven in our social fabric and this makes it difficult for people to see it as something which can cause problems."
> —Donald Stechshulte medical director

"People think drinking will create all kinds of good times and fun times," said Bob Thomas, coordinator of drug & alcohol programs "Alcohol is a very potent drug and people need to become educated if they choose to become users."

I had an idea that there was something wrong but I didn't want to look at the problem. I would feel upset and ashamed and drink to cover it up. It's a cycle.

Katie had a drinking problem.

"When people look forward to drinking to intoxication on a regular basis it goes beyond social drinking and becomes problem drinking," said Thomas.

According to Student Health Services, frequently drinking to intoxication, drinking as a means of coping, and blackouts are three warning signs for problem drinking.

I had sex with someone and I look back now and think he's not even someone I'd want to sit next to on the bus. I was drunk and men took advantage of me. I did things I never intended to do.

According to Arlyne Hoyt, director of psychological services, many cases of sexual abuse are alcohol related. "Alcohol impairs the judgement of both men and women," said Hoyt.

I overdosed my freshman year. I completely blacked out and they took me away in an ambulance. People told me that I was screaming and hitting and scratching people. I remember hearing that that the girls on my hall were crying. At dinner the next night I still had a blood alcohol level of .39. I was still intoxicated so they had to wait to send me back. It was humiliating and I just wanted to forget about it and play it down. I knew everyone was talking about it when I wasn't around but the whole thing was hush hush.

> "I had sex with someone and I look back now and think he's not even someone I'd want to sit next to on the bus."

According to Hoyt, it is important not to enable someone who may have a drinking problem. Denying that there is a problem and covering up or lying for the problem drinker only supports his or her behavior. "Don't encourage problem drinking," said Katie. "If your friend is throwing up on their bed sheets let them wake up in it."

I think my parents were in as much denial as I was. They thought that since I was doing well in classes there really couldn't be a problem.

Katie was arrested and had her license taken away.

The judge asked me if I had a problem and I said no. I just wanted to get out of there.

Katie also had to comply with university disciplinary procedures. She was assigned to community service and wrote a paper explaining Act 31. "I did community service with the other people who got caught and we joked about it," said Katie. "It didn't really help."

According to John Dunlop, dean of students, the university "had a schedule of uniform sanctions for violations of the alcohol policy."

"These sanctions were not educational to the extent that we had hoped they would be," said Dunlop. The university is currently revising these sanctions in an effort to decrease illegal consumption of alcohol and provide aid for students who may be problem drinkers.

"We are trying to make the sanctions more sensitive to the needs of the individual and more educational, said Dunlop. Alcohol violations will be placed in one of four categories according to the level of severity.

Students who display public drunkeness will be required to write a paper on a topic related to alcohol abuse determined by the coordinator of drug & alcohol programs.

My parents were on the way. I convinced myself to sit quietly and wait for them. I don't know what made me stay. I had suicidal thoughts every day. I just wanted to end everything. As scared as I was I knew it might be an end. When they came they told me they still loved me.

Katie went into a rehabilitation center and has remained sober. Now she provides programming for first year students and attempts to reach out to others who may need help. "Use the resources the university provides," said Katie.

Both Bob Thomas and Psychological Services are available for individual counseling and all appointments are confidential. "If someone has a problem support them and go with them all the way until they enter into a helping relationship," said Thomas.

Bill is also a recovering alcoholic.

I started partying every day. I never thought there was anything wrong because everyone was doing it.

"The college environment is very conducive to drinking," said Thomas. Alcohol is readily available at parties and social gatherings and people with drinking problems can find people to "party" with during the week and on weekends.

Thomas stressed that an individual does not have to be an alcoholic in order to have problems with alcohol. "A social dependence can be just as disturbing as a physical dependence," said Thomas. Individuals who frequently drink to intoxication in social settings may have developed a social dependence on the drug.

According to Stechshulte, "weekend drinkers run the risk of harming themselves when they are drunk as well as risking damage to the liver."

"After five drinks a person will show signs of elevation of liver enzymes in the bloodstream; this shows that liver cells are dying faster than the body can process them," said Stechshulte.

When my father died, all my insecurity and pain surfaced. I couldn't deal with it because I was too busy partying when everyone else was learning how to cope. It was no longer fun. I drank to escape. I wanted to die so I wouldn't have to go on.

Bill realized the extent of his problem and sought help.

I realized that I had a disease and that I wasn't a bad person. I learned that I didn't have to live that way for the rest of my life and that I could get help.

Although people with drinking problems may feel trapped in their situation, Bucknell offers counseling services that can help problem drinkers."

You have to want to help yourself. You can't do it for your girlfriend or boyfriend—you have to do it for yourself.

BSG and the University administration are supplying the additional funds required to staff and operate the library during the extended period.

During this experimental period the library will be staffed by full time employees.

"Should this be successful we will try to staff with student assistants in the future," said Young.

According to Young, Bucknell's frame of reference schools also implement extended library hours during the crunch study time.

Library administrators are working to ensure the safety of students who utilize the extra study time.

"There will be a security person in the library during extended hours," said Young.

She also stressed that public safety officers have agreed to provide an escort service for students leaving the library late at night.

"We are aware that students will be concerned about walking around late at night," said Young. "We will encourage students to take advantage of the escort service."

BSG and library administration will meet in February to evaluate the program and determine if it will be implemented on a permanent basis.

Late requisitions affect book prices

BY JEFF BOULTER AND JOYA DASS

Each year students complain about the amount of money they receive for selling their used books. However, there is more to this process than meets the eye.

The process begins with the professors. They send in their lists of books their students will need for next semester. These requisitions are due to the bookstore by November 10th. However, often many requisitions are not sent in on time. Typically, only 20-25% of the professors' classes have their book requisitions in by the deadline.

"If [the requisitions] aren't coming in until late, we're not sending in the orders until late," explains Bucknell Bookstore Director David Roberts.

Those orders are to used book wholesalers who sell their books for half of the current market value of a new book. If these orders come in too late, the wholesalers may run out of books, especially ones in high demand. The bookstore is then forced to buy the books new, at full price.

Books bought back from students directly by the Bookstore, however, do provide a slightly less expensive option.

"Based on the current book market value...we buy them for half and sell them for three-quaters," said Roberts.

Used books, whether bought from a wholesaler or student directly, are sold at three-quarters of the new book price, while new books are sold at their price plus a 25% profit margin for the bookstore.

There are, however, some legitimate reasons why professors may not submit requisitions by the deadline.

Science and engineering professors, whose fields are constantly changing, wait until new editions of their textbooks are announced to order. New professors may not teach that political science course the same way or arrive too late to order.

If the bookstore receives a requisition at any time during the buy-back period, it will purchase the book on the spot. "The buy-back is Econ 101—supply and demand," said Roberts. If the bookstore needs your books, you could make a hefty profit.

If not, maybe your little brother would like a chem book for Christmas this year.

Student reaction to "Career Search" has been mixed.

"It's very easy to use and it is nice that you can specify companies with a certain number of employees or in a specific geographic location," said Ruthie Dy '93, "but I think a big fault of the system is that you don't know about job availability."

Other students echoed this concern. "My initial response to it is that you can go into it looking at what kinds of companies have the kinds of positions you are interested in but unless you want to just put out resumes and see what happens, I'm not sure what kind of results you would get," said Kelly Ann Gosline '93. "It doesn't really list job openings."

Despite these drawbacks, Beck looks forward to very positive result from "Career Search." "I can't be more supportive of the fact that the University enabled us to purchase this," said Beck. "We really felt it was worth doing this for our students."

Residential Life seeks applicants

The Office of Residential Life is currently seeking applicants for the positions of Resident Assistant and Peer Advisor.

These undergraduate positions are available to students who will be of at least Junior standing in the 1993-94 academic year. More information can be obtained at information sessions beginning Monday, November 23 at noon in Walls Lounge. Other information sessions will be held November 30, and December 1 and 9.

Applications will be available at these sessions. For further information, contact the Office of Residential Life.

Bucknellians travel to NYC

Tickets are on sale now for a bus trip to New York City on Saturday, December 5.

Tickets cost $15 per seat and can be purchased until November 30 in the Office of Student Activities, located on the third floor of the Langone Center.

The bus will leave Bucknell at 7 a.m. that Saturday and will depart New York City at 11 p.m.

Fraternity sponsors Italian-style dinner

Phi Gamma Delta fraternity is sponsoring "Luigi Figi," an Italian-style dinner festivity tonight and Saturday night from 5 to 8 p.m. at the Figi house, located downhill at 78 University Avenue.

Proceeds from the dinner will benefit the Lewisburg Little League.

Fraternity sponsors food drive

Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc. is sponsoring a Thanksgiving food drive and party on Saturday, November 21 in the Langone Center Cave.

Patrons can offer two boxed goods or two canned goods, or $1 as the admission fee.

Proceeds from the drive will benefit S.V.W.I.T. (Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition).

Memorial poinsettias on sale

Orders must be placed by noon on Wednesday, November 25 for memorial poinsettia plants to be placed in Rooke Chapel this Christmas season.

The sanctuary will be decorated prior to the Candlelight Service, which begins December 5, and the plants will remain in the sanctuary through the morning service on December 13. Plants will then be available to their patrons, or, at the patron's request, Bucknell students will deliver the plants to shut-ins.

Interested persons should contact the Chapel Office at 524-1592.

Bicyclist circles the globe

In 1990, Vladimir Kovolenko, a 34 year old native of Novosibirsk, Russia, rode his bicycle around the world, covering 13,000 miles in 240 days. He later toured each of the 50 United States, also on bicycle.

Kovolenko will present a slide show and will share his experiences on Tuesday, November 24 at 7:30 p.m. at the Gallery Theater, located in the Langone Center.

Lehigh to cut library hours

A plan to cut library hours next semester was proposed to the Lehigh University Student Senate meeting earlier this month.

The proposal's purpose is to reduce library hours (mainly closing the library at midnight rather than 2 a.m.), thereby saving $10,000 in the library's budget.

Lehigh is facing major budget cuts within the 1992-93 and 1993-94 school years. The library's budget will be cut by at least $40,000 this year and $100,000 next year.

Holy Cross's water supply may be contaminated

Holy Cross College in Worcester, Massachusettes has been affected by high levels of lead content that have been plaguing the city's water supply.

Holy Cross's water, which hasn't been tested for lead content, has filters that remove bacteria from drinking watrer, but possesses no similar protection against lead. As a result, the school's drinking water is possibly contaminated.

Anti-Semitic, sexist grafitti found in Tufts' dorm

Last month, students living in a suite in Haskell Hall of Tufts University awoke to find that the doors of certain rooms in their all-female quarters had been scrawled with sexist and anti-Semitic graffiti.

A university spokesman said that vandals drew swastikas and wrote derogatory remarks only on the doors of rooms occupied by Jewish women, leaving the doors of rooms of non-Jewish students clean.

The vandalist(s) have not been apprehended at the time of press.

Professors launch group effort

Liberty University in Lynchburg, Virginia has broken new ground this semester with a team-teaching effort in an English class.

Five professors are team-teaching the course; two are teaching two novels each, and the remaining three professors are each teaching one novel. The school feels that this system would allow the specialists and experts to teach the novel of their expertise.

BSG ELECTION SPECIAL

Whom should we elect for BSG office?

1st Vice-president

Carrie Abramo

Abramo's experience includes serving as a BSG Congress member, working as a first year Resident Assistant and holding positions within her sorority.

If she wins, she wants to keep people better informed.

One of her special projects would include revising the present judicial system because it does not work. Abramo said, "Many students are getting hurt."

She would give more power to the Committee on Student Conduct because "students have a good perspective on what is right and wrong."

Abramo also feels that many crimes go unreported because nothing gets done.

Heather Eisenman

Eisenman's experience includes serving as a BSG Congress member last year, working as chair of the Student Affair committee, and serving on CCA, COI and the Judical System Implementation Task Force. She is also a junior representative on Panhel and on her Class Cabinet.

She feels that it is not important why she is running but what she can do as the most qualified person and able to make changes that are necessary.

Eisenman said, "There is too much apathy in BSG congress. Kick members out who do not attend meetings."

She would also like to see communication among all members of Bucknell Community. She would use the University Core Council to do this.

According to Eisenman, "Increasing the influence of BSG will hopefully get faculty away from thinking of itself as a legislator for everything."

Ted Rosenthal

While Rosenthal has no experience at college level student government, he is "unhappy with many things at Bucknell" and thus running for office.

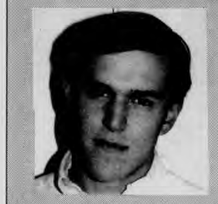
His goals include gathering more funding for specific interest groups and increasing student involvement and input in BSG.

Rosenthal would also like to increase the power of BSG because if BSG is more powerful and representative then the administration will have to listen. According to Rosenthal, "School should be here for us. If you give the students what they want, they will not be as apathetic."

He also feels that students are upset about the academic scene as well as the social scene and therefore BSG should sponsor [illegible] as many faculty [illegible] tional politics, probably the

Who will be the next Mike Thomas?

WILL IT BE A WOMAN? WILL THE SAE LEGACY CONTINUE? WILL THE ROSS PEROT OF BUCKNELL EMERGE?



Garrett Austin

While Austin has no previous student government experience, he does not think that he needs it, for he could work with current president, Michael Thomas.

He feels confident in his ability and that his grass roots campaign is needed because "in three years has not seen much result as a student with what BSG has done with student involvement."

Austin would move BSG away from student-faculty interaction and towards student interaction, increasing the power of ESG so that student sovereignity is increased.

He thinks that some professors are not doing their jobs and that a student based faculty review board compromised of all four classes and faculty should be implemented.

According to Austin, "It's time for the administration to treat students as adults—especially on the social scene."

Austin also feels that special interest groups need more representation on this campus.

Sheila Pretti

Pretti's experience includes serving on the Appropriations Committee as secretary, as a BSG Congress representative, working in the finance office, holding an office in her sorority, and being trained as Assistant Business Manager to The Bucknellian.

While working with Congress, she was also appointed to the Judicial System Implementation Task Force.

Pretti is running for office because she is "interested in what happens under the surface at Bucknell and what she can do about it."

She wants people to get caught up in BSG. Since there is presently not enough communication she would improve student awareness by personalized mailings.

Pretti would also like to improve student-faculty interaction if she is elected and pointed out that some committes do not even have students on them.

Brian Mannix

Mannix's student government experience includes serving on BSG Congress for two years, as the Academic Affairs committee chair, a BSG Executive Board member, and as a member of the Committee on Instruction (COI), Capital Campaign and Middle States Review committees

In his fraternity he was the Community Service chair. His house received best public relations on campus while he was serving.

While working as the Academic Affwairs chair, he implemented Veritas, the student evaulation book of the faculty.

As a member of COI he fought for the Jan plan, trying to get it implemented as part of second semester.

He realizes, "Some things of BSG are working and other are not." To change things he knows that BSG needs better advertising so people know what it does.

He feels that because he is in touch with the campus and knows many different people that he could make student government work.

Treasurer

Dinesh Achria

Achria's previous experience with dealing with finances includes serving as head of his MG 101 company's finance department.

According to Achria he wants to, "take part in the campus community and sit with representative of groups and work out their needs with them."

As Treasurer he would see what was wrong with the past and see what needs to be changed.

While he would not want to cut anyone's funding, he realizes that "bigger groups might need more." He also thinks that minorities need more representaion on campus.

However, with Achria as Treasurer, though, all groups will get the "basement" of what they have now.

In general, Achria wants Appropriation to work together as a group.

2nd Vice-president

Steve Wise

Wise's student government experience includes serving as BSG Congress representative for last two years, and working as a member of the fiscal affairs committee, Appropriations Committee and the planning and budget committee.

He feels that "there is a lot that is needed to be done to improve Bucknell," but that we shouldn't be "basing these decisions on frame of reference schools."

Wise wants more enrollment to increase financial aid and to get more professors. He feels that this will bring in more diverse and better qualified students.

As an officer of BSG, he would work to have more money for cultural groups. According to Wise, "We have enough money to give these groups the money they need."

Wise would also make BSG members more active because students have good ideas, but do not know where to go with them.

As second vice-president, he would like to assign a BSG member to a set group of students to empower them and BSG.

Jacinta Bares

Bares previous experience in Student Government includes serving on the Appropriation Committee this year and as a BSG Congress member.

She also works in finance office and feels that is the best qualified for the position.

Bares said that she has a sincere interest in what goes on and that to her the rescheduling of the calender is an important issue.

As Treasurer, she would follow Appropriation guidelines. The only changes that she would initiate would be in response to inflation.

According to Bares, "One cannot give more to one group than the other." Minority groups should not get special consideration.

Beth Cahill

Cahill's student government experience includes serving as Vice-president of her freshmen class and as a BSG Congress representative.

She feels that all four offices are important, and that the second vice-president is not just a taker of notes.

As an officer she would "kick people out of Congress who do not attend without valid excuses," for "members who do not participate are hurting BSG."

Cahill also proposed establishing a mentor program in which freshmen would be assigned a senior in their major.

And, according to Cahill, "Communication needs to be improved between the students and the faculty."

Joe Sebelin

While Sebelin has no college experince in student government, he said that he is a hard worker and will bring that trait to the office.

He feels that the job of second vice-president is to work for the president. Sebelin said, "Everyone has to work together."

Therefore, if he is elected, he will not bring his own agenda. He feels that officers cannot have a split agenda.

His job would be to facililiate matters. Sebelin said that he would assume jobs that president did not have time to do.

Speaking of the school on the whole, Sebelin voiced that diversity and multicultural matters are important.

Brian Vettoso

While Vettoso has no experience at the college level in student government, he wants to be involved in something mathematical and money-oriented.

He feels that the treasurer's responsibilities are to allocate money and "get done what needs to be done." According to Vettoso, the treasurer should "give in relation to the greatest good of all."

Vettoso also feels that there is no single most important issue on this campus.

A. Schneggenburger

Schneggenburger's student government experience includes serving on the Appropriation Committee for the last two years and as a BSG Congress member.

She has also worked as co-captain of volleyball team and characterizes herself as a volunteer, able to sacrifice time and "pick up the slack."

Schneggenburger feels that she is approachable. As a veteran member of BSG she feels that she knows the faults and good points of BSG and what needs to be changed.

According to Schneggenberger, there is a need for better communication between the faculty and the students. She said, "The faculty's decisions should not outweigh student decisions."

According to Schneggenburger, "BSG needs to prove how representative they are. Our government cannot function without student input."

To help publicize the group's work, she would like a newsletter and a special section in The Bucknellian.

Schneggenburger is also in favor of addressing the drinking policy disciplinary system.

The Bucknellian would vote Brian Mannix for President, Heather Eisenman for first vice-president (also possibly Carrie Abramo), Steve Wise or Aubrey Schneggenburger for second vice-president and a right in vote for Treasurer. You go and vote for your favorite on Monday.

Interviews with the candidates were conducted by members of The Bucknellian staff. Information for this page was compiled by David Barry and Susan Smith. All photos were taken by Heather Jobson.

EDITORIAL

Empower BSG, see what happens

And who should you vote for in the BSG election on Monday? The coolest person, of course. After all, the offices are just a popularity contest or at best a resume builder, don't you think?

This is obviously how the Board of Trustees and the faculty views the Bucknell Student Government at least. While these two groups permit a few select students to serve on committees with them, these students, while thoughtful and capable representatives, are merely tokens. Maybe their voices, which contain the opinions of the student body, are listened to, but they are not weighed heavily.

Why not? Isn't student opinion important? Aren't the students that we elect responsible?

We at The Bucknellian interviewed the candidates for BSG office on Tuesday night and while we wouldn't want all those running to speak with the trustees or faculty on behalf of us students, most of those we met would do a fine job.

The trustees and faculty might even find some of the candidates to be downright impressive. We did. All expressed deep concern over their schoolmates' problems. They seemed to understand and be able to communicate what the problems areas are. They even had workable ideas about how to solve the social and academic problems on campus. If given the chance, they knew exactly what they would say to the faculty and Board of Trustees.

Candidates also had ideas about how to better BSG, which we liked and agreed that needed to be done. To better their image and promote a sense of seriousness, most candidates desired a stern attendance and voting policy, knowing that they need no lazy members to drag them down.

Candidates also suggested that the BSG Congress members be held accountable to their constituency. This could be done either by assigning about 80 class members to each representative or by setting up a table in the LC which would be manned by representatives one day a week during the lunch hour. Both options would allow for more student input into the student government. Hopefully then the faculty and Board of Trustees would listen to BSG and realize that they are the voice of the students.

If the students feel that their opinion matters, they will take elections more seriously and look to vote for the best candidate. More qualified and responsible candidates will then want to run.

How could the faculty and Board of Trustees not empower BSG then? How could they ignore responsible, thinking students who represent the opinions of many? Surely they couldn't take their neglect that far?

Don't give the faculty and Board of Trustees any excuse not to listen to student opinion. Vote on Monday for whom you feel will be the most responsible. Vote for a change initiating leadership.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Attack on Christians is propaganda

TO THE EDITOR:

I would like to respond to the article in the November 13 issue of the Bucknellian by Dave Barry entitled "The New Right is the New Intolerance." I fear the author has misunderstood the position of the "Religious Right" by trying to understand Christian behavior without attempting to understand the Christian perspective, and basic assumptions with which we view the world. I would like an opportunity to explain the frame of reference with which the Christian community operates in hopesthat this explanation might facilitate more constructive communication than the article written last week.

This assumption is faulty because it misses one of the central ideas of the Christian faith; the sinful nature of man. This, I believe, is one of the only theological issues empirically validated by 3000 years of human history

Many of today's social leaders have made the error of blaming our social ills on the Bible and Christianity. These leaders look at what the Bible states about environmentalism, for example, and then project from the fact that we do have "dominion over all the earth," that Christians believe that we have the right to abuse the earth. This assumption is faulty because it misses one of the central ideas of the Christian faith; the sinful nature of man. This, I believe, is one of the only theological issues empirically validated by 3000 years of human history: the crucifixion of Christ, Henry VIII's treatment of his wives, Jack the Ripper, slavery, racism, sexism, the Nazi holocaust, terrorism, (need I go on?).

The sinful nature of man basically states that, given to options a man or woman will have a tendency to choose the morally inferior option. If we are honest, we can see this in our own lives. This, I believe, is where Christians motives and actions are misunderstood. The effect of this dogma is that, though Christians try, the teachings of the Bible are practiced imperfectly. However, it would be utterly illogical for you to invalidate the source of the belief system, based upon the behavior of the believers. Analogous to this would be if, the next time you make a mistake on a test you blame the professor for your mistake. If the professor teaches the material correctly (as the Bible does) then you can only blame the individual who made the mistake (and mistakes are inevitable because

I find it offensive for any group of people to be stereotyped according to their skin color, religious upbringing, political convictions, or their gender; and, again I ask the question, what gives you the right to propagate the "bigotry and hatred" that you are so quick to point out in others.

I would like to respond to Jacinta Bunnell's article concerning problems with the production of meat. She asks us all to seriously consider becoming vegetarians for three reasons. First, the method in which animals are raised does not permit them to have an enjoyable life before they are consumed, secondly, the environment suffers as a result of their production, thirdly, the food animals eat could feed the hungry if we all would just "Stop eating the flesh of animals."

Omnivore counters vegetarian points

TO THE EDITOR:

Let's look at her first assertions: the animals we eat are raised with too little freedom to move around, they are overcrowded, and they may not get enough sunlight. To this I say, BIG DEAL. These conditions fit everyone in Swartz A and B wings but we don't have a dedicated group looking out for us. Now, I agree that it would be nice to give every chicken half an acre or so to roam around on to please the vegetarians, but at the same time, I don't want to spend $159.95 for three pieces with a side of slaw and fries. And for those poor chickens who have their beaks "cut off", well this wouldn't happen if they weren't "pecking each other to death or resorting to cannibalism," now would it?

She claims soil runoff to be a major pollutant as well, but ironically, if we all became vegetarians fertilizer use would be stepped up to unheard of levels and soil runoff would increase proportionately with the addition of new fields.

Let's go to the environment. I get the impression that if we omnivores don't cease and desist our "tradition of dominance" over animals and start eating three salads a day, Chesapeake Bay will become a great big manure dump, and it will all be our fault. Certainly, I must have misinterpreted her argument because, as we all know, the bay has tiny, green microorganisms which thrive more from fertilizer than manure, and are the biggest problem the bay faces. She claims soil runoff to be a major pollutant as well, but ironically, if we all became vegetarians fertilizer use would be stepped up to unheard of levels and soil runoff would increase proportionately with the addition of new fields. Then the bay might really be in trouble.

The final major point she offers to convince us that meat should be abandoned is that all the world could be fed if animals were not eating up all the food. us that be fed. The fact is that all the world could be fed even with all of our animals eating their fill - but nobody to date has stepped forward to foot the bill. The is no shortage of fertile land on this planet, but there is a shortage of paying customers. Hungry people don't have enough food because they have no money to pay for it, and when/if they get the money, more people will go into agriculture to fill the demand. If Jacinta Bunnell wants to stop world hunger, an appeal should be made to our charitable nature, but it is silly to think that farmers feeding corn to cows which they will sell for profit would just give that corn away to the poor if there very fewer cows.

Finally, I think I speak for a large number of people when I say that we who do eat animals are tired of vegetarians telling us that it is wrong to do so. It is not that we are trying to "dominate" animals, but rather that we might be of the opinion that animals "make darn good eating".

Look at the eyes

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing because I am very disturbed about the lack of respect for women on this campus. I am fed up with talking to men and having them talk back, not to me, but to my breasts! I think that one of the most important parts of communication is eye contact. How can I tell if someone is understanding what I am saying if they are looking down? Not only that, but I feel like an object, as if he is just undressing me with his eyes, and is not at all interested in what I have to say.

I don't think I am the only woman on this campus who is receiving this treatment. Many of my friends complain of the same treatment. We feel that this sexist practice has got to stop. I feel apprehensive every time I talk to a man, and it really bothers me.

...as much the novel of expertise.

If you think you are immortal, you are wrong!

MEG WICKMAN

"You kids all think that you're immortal." How many times has that generalization been applied to you and your peers? Is the accusation a fair one? You could make another generalization, and say that our generation has had at least as much to contend with as any other in recent history, and we're coped pretty well.

We learned early that it was a dangerous world out there. Our parents cautioned us about drugs and violent crime in between their orders to look both ways before crossing the street. And we listened: we know better than to get into a car with a drunk driver, to leave our doors unlocked, to walk alone at night. We have become adults; we have learned how to take care of ourselves.

It's difficult to keep in mind a sense of potential doom when you meet someone attractive, especially if you've been drinking. It's difficult to believe that someone who looks perfectly healthy may be carrying a deadly virus.

Of course, the transition to adulthood is traditionally marked by certain rites of passage. Of these, none is as thoroughly thought about and discussed as sex. No surprise here: add a biological drive to a generous supply of media attention, and you get a topic of interest to everyone from giggling eight-graders to CEOS.

But sex has never been a risk-free activity. We all know that; some may say the sense of danger, of taking a chance, adds to its appeal. Unfortunately, many people do not take the risk seriously enough. It used to be that couples were worried about an unwanted pregnancy; they still are. But that threat pales in comparison to the risk of contracting a sexually transmitted disease as lethal as AIDS.

Unless you've been living in a vacuum since the mid-eighties, you've heard what you can do to protect yourself. But it doesn't take an expert to notice that what people know intellectually is not always transferred to their behavior. It's difficult to keep in mind a sense of potential doom when you meet someone attractive, especially if you've been drinking. It's difficult to believe that someone who looks perfectly healthy may be carrying a deadly virus. It's difficult to comprehend that it can happen to you, especially if you haven't yet discovered that someone you know has the disease. You are not immortal; it can happen to you; and you are more likely to protect yourself if you acknowledge those facts.

There should be no doubt in your mind that the HIV virus, along with many other STD'S, is here at Bucknell. Certainly, not all the students who are infected know that they are. They could be anyone: someone in your class, that person checking mail, that cute guy at the fraternity party . . . maybe even yourself.

The necessity of taking all these precautions may seem terribly unfair. But, as adults, we have learned only too well that life is rarely fair. It's still a dangerous world out there, and taking care of yourself is more important than ever.

The battle of the sexes is a just war, so choose sides

BY CHARLES SACKREY
Guest Columnist

In your issue on 11/6, Samantha Schivers wrote an article that I admired for its sparkling energy and honesty. I would like to respond to what I think is her specific argument and, perhaps, to broaden the issue. Ms. Schivers complained bitterly that too many men in her life talk to, and about, women in the terms of a putrid flood of sexual innuendo. She says, for particulars, that she is tired of the terms "whore, slut, and tease" being used to label women when given their meanings, such words more aptly would describe the behavior of most men she knows. She also says that, "I am tired of having to make it clear to men that dinner is not synonymous with sex. I am just plain tired of having to deal with all of the nacho male baggage that goes along with taking care of men."

I write as one supporting Ms. Schivers' underlying premise that sexual harassment is not something that happens now and then, but is a behavior pattern dominating relations between men and women in our culture. Why? There are a number of causes, and I would like to discuss a prominent one, the fact that the higher reaches of our society for the most part remain a Man's World. I believe that to the extent men harass women, sexually or otherwise, or make decisions that benefit them relative to women, their doing so habitually can only happen in such a world.

In this kind of world, all men cannot help but believe, at least some of the time (and some men, all of the time), that they are superior creatures. This attitude is often so emotionally charged, particularly for a man publicly committed to women's equality, that it is buried deeply in his subconscious mind.

Exactly how is it a Man's World? The great centers of power in our society are the national government and the major corporations, and in them men have the final say about virtually everything. In national politics, probably the very most powerful people are the president and vice president, members of the U.S. Supreme Court and the U.S. Senate, the head of the Federal Reserve Board, and top congressional leaders. By my accounting of these roughly 120 people, only six—about 5 %—are (or will soon be) women. Among members of the private workforce generally, according to Business Week (6-8-92), a full 97 percent of the "senior executives" are men, slightly down from 99 percent in 1981.

To get closer to Ms. Schivers' campus world, at the higher levels of university life, according to a recent article in the New York Times Magazine (11-8-92), 88 percent of college presidents, provosts and chancellors, 87 percent of full professors, and 77 percent of trustees, are men. The article goes on to detail the struggles at Columbia University of a feminist English professor (who also writes murder mysteries as Amanda Cross) who after 32 years is quitting, saying that "In life, as in fiction, women who speak out usually end up punished or dead."

Bucknell's power structure exemplifies this overall composition, except that it is more male dominated than the average university. Currently, all three top officers of Bucknell are male, as are 35 of its 40 trustees. One need not question the commitment to sexual equality of these dominating males—and I don't—to believe that their status atop the Bucknell heap states emphatically that men are somehow "different" than women. It pronounces to the world, without a whisper but nonetheless, that men are more gifted in governing, further implying that they are smarter, more imaginative, more capable of making the "hard decisions," that men possess the most of that bundle of traits that creates "leaders." In this kind of world, all men cannot help but believe, at least some of the time (and some men all of the time), that they are superior creatures. This attitude is often so emotionally charged, particularly for a man publicly committed to women's equality, that it is buried deeply in his subconscious mind. To the effect that men do assume their superiority, consciously or otherwise, they take on the arrogance of being in power, of which sexual harassment is a key manifestation.

Through such eyes, an 18 year old male, who requests oral sex from a woman to whom he loans a pen... presumes he is excitingly flirtatious, heroic if his chums are nearby, not realizing that to most women such a comment reveals that he has been moronized by the arrogance of his power.

Concerning results of male domination, other than sexual harassment, imagine for a moment a contrasting environment, a Bucknell University where the three top officers and 35 of the 40 trustees are women. Under such circumstances would women at Bucknell endure less harassment from men than they do now? I certainly think so. For instance, our 38 women leaders would undoubtedly be more sensitive to the problem since 95% of the time women are its victims. Furthermore, three top female officers and 35 women trustees would almost certainly re-construct key parts of the environment at Bucknell which are not conducive to gender equality and are often the sites of harassing behavior.

For instance, the entire campus might be as well lighted at night as is the football stadium and the football field when the team practices. Better lighting of the darker reaches would ease a kind of fear experienced by many campus women that simply cannot be understood by men. The university might actually have its own child care center (as do many corporations), so that its employees' children will not have to contend with the cramped space of the one that is on campus (which is not owned by the university but whose rent is subsidized). If for instance, the child care center had the same space now alloted to just one fraternity house, imagine how greatly that would improve the environment for both children and teachers. Indeed, if yet another fraternity house could made available, the two rooms of the Women's Resource Center and the two very small rooms of the Race/Gender Resource Center could be transformed into a set of offices that would embody a more believable institutional commitment to the issues that concern these Centers.

Indeed, our 38 women leaders would almost certainly transform the membership rules of, or abolish outright, the fraternity system, as they would no doubt find segregated bastions of male privilege inconsistent with their own deepest values. They would also, quite naturally, remove the expensive football program from its prominence in the athletic program. The likelihood of eliminating fraternities would, of course, exist since none of the 38 women would have themselves been a fraternity member and thus voting to abolish the system would not therefore become a source of deep anguish or erosive and immobilizing guilt for them. In any case, our women leaders would almost certainly not cramp the daycare center and the Resource Centers, while at the same time allowing for the most well-appointed spaces to be those where some of the men live and where some others of them play. Such allocations as these are the outcome of male dominance, nothing more and nothing less.

Since this same principal regarding male dominated environments operates at the national level, we Americans have an irrational health care system, retarded social policies concerning family leave, child care, care for pregnant women and infants, and most of the victims of these programs are women and children. An especially nasty example of the domination principal at the national level was the confirmation hearings of Clarence Thomas before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Who can forget the nightmarish prosecutor, Arlen Specter, and his slithering sidekicks as they cowered to Clarence Thomas' claim he had been lynched by a redneck mob? Of course, the lynching victim was Anita Hill, hung out to dry by a white men's club unable to conceal that it was aiding and abetting yet another sexual harasser to squirm his way to acquittal. By the way, Arlen Specter and Orrin Hatch stood out, even in this crowd, because, in the heat of a battle, they tend to take on, as in a metamorphoses, the least endearing

The football team needs student support

BY CRISTINA TISA

It was a beautifully clear and crispy fall day last Saturday; perfect, in fact, for a football game. Lucky for me we had one. So I joined two friends for what proved to be a very pleasant afternoon.

Our team was ready, the cheerleaders were chipper and happy; Becky and Bucky Bison were in top form, and the marching band played well despite the freezing wind. The hot dogs were hot, the hot chocolate was rich, and the candy was cold. The only essential aspect missing was the crowd. So, where were you all when our team needed support? At home nursing a hangover? Sleeping? Studying, perhaps? We only had a few home games this season, and I was really surprised to realize that only a small fraction of our student body takes advantage of such an opportunity. Granted, our team has been having a tough year, but they're still our team. They are our friends, classmates, boyfriends, and lab partners. They are dedicated athletes who spend an incredible amount of time preparing for their games, and they are students who have maintained a delicate balance between athletics and academics. They deserve our recognition and support.

Imagine spending a large part of your college life in preparation for a weekly event. You've worked hard and have suffered injuries, but you keep pushing; waiting for the moment when it'll all be worth it. You envision the glory, and can feel the adrenaline coarsing through your veins. The moment comes, and you perform your best. You would want the entire world to be watching you, and cheering for you. You would want everyone to know that it was you. Of course, you would feel the personal satisfaction, but you want everyone to share in your triumph. It is nodifferent for a football player.When the team runs the ball into the end zone they want to hear the crowd roar. They want to know that all their friends and classmates saw them score, or execute a perfect pattern. It is their time to shine, and we all should be illuminated.

The crowd is such a part of the game, and there is no way to justify the size of the crowds the team generates now. The win-loss record should have no bearing on attendence. We should be loyal supporters in triumph and in tragedy. Besides, attending a game is fun. Even if you don't like football, go for the sheer social benefits. It is very informal; one is much more likely to talk to the neighboring student spectator because there is an atmosphere of freedom and excitement. Conversations often begin when a group of students react to a play or call. You automatically have something in common with everyone around you: you're watching the same game, and have gathered together to cheer for your team. Questions fly freely, and answers come willingly. Ever ask a bunch of guys what a flea flicker is? Try it, and I guarantee you'll get the most detailed and accurate answer possible.

The win-loss record should have no bearing on attendence. We should be loyal supporters in triumph and in tragedy.

Another reason to attend the games is that it permits you to discuss the state of affairs. If you vote you have the right to criticize. If you don't keep your criticisms to yourself. Likewise, if you go to the home games you have earned the right to criticize our team, and discuss the problems with the game plan. If you skip the games, skip the comments.

Our last game is Saturday at 1:00 p.m. against Colgate. Don't miss out on the experience of attending a Bucknell football game. Come hear the cheerleaders, watch the marching band during half-time, and root for our fellow Bucknellians. Wear one of your University sweatshirts; grab your gloves and ID cards (admission is ftee with your card, so no excuses) and join your friends in giving our team the crowd it deserves. Be a part of the news; don't just read it anymore.

qualities of a stalker on the prowl.

Having raised the issue of stalkers on the prowl, we can return to the men who are harassing Ms. Schivers. Like harassers everywhere, they are simply playing out their role as the genderin power, and lurking behind the sexual innuendos, with which Ms Schivers and her female friends are bombarded, is what Marilyn Frie (in her especially thoughtful book, The Politics of Experience) calls the "arrogant eye" of male domination. Through such eyes, an 18 year old male, who requests oral sex from a woman to whom he loins a pen (an example Ms. Schivers provides), presumes he is excitingly flirtatious, heroic if his chums are nearby, not realizing that to most women such a comment reveals that he has been moronized by the arrogance of his power.

Such comments by men do not reveal sexual love and attraction, but are shots fired at random because they can get away with them. Nonetheless, sexual policites in our time are changing dramatically, and more and more women are declaring war on the males who oppress them, at home and away. Surely, this will be (at least) another Hundred Years War, because it might take that long for women to conquer power positions ample emough to contend with males for the overall development and underlying morality of our basic social policies. Given that it will be a protracted war, we all migh as well get to the business of deciding for ourselves on which side we want to fight. Those siding with women can only hope the women will have learned enough from the men's mistakes to make it a bit easier for everyone to amble the way to the grave. In any case, my congratulations to Ms. Schivers for lobbing her shells toward a foxhole that needs bombing, one I should admit that I myself have often occupied, when I felt it alright to be there and I could get away with it.

Campus community responds to football coverage

TO THE EDITOR:

I am writing in response to the stories in last week's The Bucknellian concerning the Bucknell football team.

While many of the issues discussed were legitimate, I take extreme offense at the charge that Bucknell's football coaching staff exercises some sort of "racial stereotyping" or prejudice against black players.

Let me begin by saying that, as a former editor of The Bucknellian, I find it perfectly within The Bucknellian's right to examine the troubled football program. There are those within my own department who would disagree with me, but I commend The Bucknellian for investigating a sensitive subject. Good reporters do that.

Good reporters also, however, substantiate their stories with concrete evidence, and Andrew Cohen fails miserably with regard to the racial stereotyping issue. Concrete evidence would include the names of players who are pointing the fingers, not just arbitrary "player 1, player 2" labels that allow the accusers to hide cowardly in the shadows.

Concrete evidence also would include statistical information that supports such a claim, but that data simply does not exist in this case.

"Player number 2" alleges that the coaches "don't play [blacks] on offense." Well, player 2 then certainly can't be Damon Garner, a fine young black man who has started at wide receiver all season. Nor can it be Troy White, a black wide receiver who was the Bison's top kick return specialist before suffering an unfortunate injury in the second week of the season.

In fact, of the 15 black players currently on the Bucknell roster, six play on offense, nine play on defense. That hardly proves the claim that Bucknell coaches "don't play (blacks) on offense."

Furthermore, "player number 1" infers that tailback Kevin McElvene has had his playing time limited because he is black. I strongly disagree. Kevin McElvene simply has not performed as well as his primary counterpart at tailback, Matt Walsh. And, I might add, McElvene has had his chance. Early in the season, Buckiell's coaches alternated Walsh and McElvene, giving each virtually equal work. Walsh simply won the starting job with superior performance.

Don't got me wrong. Kevin McElvene is one of my favorite people on the team, but if I were the head coach I too would be playing Walsh more than McElvene. I believe my decision would be an informed one; I have seen every varsity game, every JV home game and many practices since I returned to Lewisburg in 1990.

I'm not sure what Andrew Cohen would do if he were the coach, but then again his decision wouldn't be an informed one; he admitted to me that he almost never goes to Bucknell football games.

A charge like racism carries with it a sense of irreversibility. Like a bad Hollywood rumor, once the charge is levied, the damage is done, regardless of the truth.

Again, let me reiterate that I felt several of the points raised in the article were legitimate, and a thorough investigative piece is perfectly within The Bucknellian's realm.

A charge of racial prejudice, however, especially when raised by anonymous players too cowardly to come forward in public, is an injustice to Lou Maranzana and his assistant coaches, who have worked extremely hard to welcome black players into the football program and the broader University community.

TO THE EDITOR:

I shouldn't have been surprised to find an article like Andrew Cohen's "Football Players Question Program" (The Bucknellian, November 13), which appeared on the front page and consumed two additional full pages, in the campus newspaper of one of those universities whose football programs serve as minor leagues for the NFL. I am rather surprised at the prominence and the extensive coverage The Bucknellian devoted to the matter.

I can't help wondering whether investigative reporting, using some anonymous sources, is the proper vehicle for dealing effectively with the issues, some of which are indeed serious, that the article raises.

Am I wrong to doubt that many faculty, administrators, or students who occupy offices would care to have their programs and their performances assessed (to use a kind word) in such away, in a public forum, at such length?

TO THE EDITOR:

I read with interest the articles by staff reporter Cohen in the November 13th edition of The Bucknellian. These articles were in reference to the football team. Having been very active as a member of the intercollegiate athletic department for thirty-four years prior to my retirement in 1990, the various comments were of interest to me.

A question came to mind—DO PLAYERS 1,2,3 and 4 REALLY EXIST? or did staff reporter Cohen develop then through his own imagination to try and sensationalize the articles further. I just cannot imagine four members of a team unit not having a better understanding of team unity than to "air out the dirty laundry with two conference rivals Lafayette and Colgate upon the horizon. Also, I read no comments from Players 1,2,3 and 4 to the extent that—"I missed quite a few passes that I should have caught" or "I missed quite a few blocks that put undue pressure upon our quarterback" or "I had many rival team's running backs in my grasp but failed to hang on and they scored". Everything seems to be finger pointing at others. A good solid team member wouldn't do that.

If Players 1,2,3 and 4 do actually exist, if they have no better concept of team unity, team togetherness or striving together for a common goal as members of a team, then we have one of the real underlying reasons for that football team's lack of success.

TO THE EDITOR:

I feel I must respond to the article on the Bucknell football issue, dated 11/13/92. I have followed B.U. sports for most of my life, being a life long resident of Lewisburg. For the most part, Bucknell has been competitive in some sports, dominating in others. Bucknell attracts scholar athletes, knowledgeable in the classroom and in their particular sports endeavor. These athletes come to B.U. looking to enhance their skills and participate in a learning experience of their chosen sport. Winning must be a part (not a "win at all costs") of each contest, otherwise why would we even keep score? Motivation should be an integral part of each coach's game plan as well as strategies, defenses, etc. After all, every other aspect of the team comes from the coaches, why not motivation?

As a recent head softball coach at Bucknell, I had first hand experience with the athletics and the administration of athletics. The athletes want and work towards a goal of success - as evidenced by a crowded weight room, gym, track, or any possible place to better condition themselves. For the most part, the coaching staffs are diligent and hardworking. Now, this brings me to the administration or Athletic Director. My dealings with this administrator were less than favorable. Quoting Rick Hartzell, "I don't think there is anything wrong with being truthful." If Bucknell athletics are ever to excel to their utmost, then the truth must start at the "top". Respect must be filtered down through the ranks and maintained by everyone, including the athletes. Lou Maranzana is doing the best he can—applaud him for it. Look above Lou, see what the Director over him is doing (when in town) to help the programs.

I wish the best of luck to all the gifted athletes of Bucknell. Your "talent level" is above and beyond what some may perceive it to be. Work hard and together to find ways to make your programs the best of the Patriot League!

Nearly 3,000 copies of The Bucknellian were removed from distribution points in the Langone Center last weekend. Witnesses working in the building saw members of the football team leave a meeting in the Center and threw the papers in the trash, destroying some of them. Their action was a violation of First Amendment rights of the free press: censorship by theft and destruction.

Obstruction of news and ideas on a university campus is an act in total conflict with every basic philosophy of this institution. Need I point out that everyone has access to The Bucknellian for disagreement or debate by means of columns and letters to the editor?

The point

When we take it out of bounds

It's a goal which is birthed even before we crawl. And as we take our first toddling steps, aiming against touchdowns of immobility, the contest officially begins. It is the game—the timeless game which allows us to define, to explore, to investigate limits, to scrutinize recondite paradigms, and to repeatedly and unabashedly poop in daddy's old sneakers.

Actually, that really did happen a few years ago when longtime friends of my family, Jim and Sadie Minton, hatched Dottie, an adorable and apparently normal baby girl. The required infant-raising procedures moved smoothly along until Jim and Sadie, after witnessing the astute way in which their child poked at her "Minnie Mouse Laugh-And-Learn Mobile" came to the conclusion that Dottie was, in fact, extraordinarily gifted. So, in a well-meaning effort to speed their young genius towards the Utopia of adulthood, the Minton's began toilet training just a bit too early. The process for prompting Dottie's precocious perception of polite poopage was simple. It involved a "Minnie Mouse Happy-Drop-Training-Bowl" and a rewarding jar of delicious Maraschino cherries.

But one day, perhaps feeling slightly constrained by the designated receptacle, Dottie choose instead to define, to explore, to investigate. Soon she was scrutinizing the recondite paradigm of Jim's tattered Reebоks (if you know what I mean) which were lying next to the miniature toilet bowl. When Jim discovered Dottie's pungent surprise in his running shoes he took it quite well, laughing good-naturedly. Then, oblivious to the dangers of positive reinforcement, he granted his princess three whole cherries just for being so darn original. She was absolutely flushed (no pun intended) with delight at her special treat. Her risky irreverence had been properly compensated. And Jim had made a hefty mistake.

One week later, every sneaker, slipper, loafer, and high heel that the Minton's owned had been placed on a top closet shelf under lock and key. It took quite a few smacks on Dottie's tender rump to put an end to her shoe-soiling way. And up to this day, they still won't take her to Nordstroms.

Of course now that we're in college, the above explorations would most likely be unnecessary. By this point in our lives we understand the unspoken boundaries of etiquette, the silent signals which dictate proper behavior, the rules which help us avoid irreverent risks of penalization. With specific and individualized (if not somewhat narcissistic) conceptions of "right" and "wrong" stamped into our psyche George Orwell style, we pass away the desire to continue the game of exploration—a game where the only objective is to test the rules, to test others' rules. And perhaps all this is a tragedy.

By this point in our lives we understand the unspoken boundaries of etiquette, the silent signals which dictate proper behavior, the rules which help us avoid irreverent risks of penalization.

I claim this to be tragic because I fear that, much like Dottie's toilet training, this halting of investigation is somewhat premature. Notice I say premature NOT immature. Yes, college is still the time and place where we are allowed the indulgence of sophomorically grand satirical statements. Thank God. We can find out what makes those "other" faceless androids tick, and temporarily take the stage, feigning the wisdom of the clown, the jester, the fool. Now God stands up for fools. So let them be as duteous as Lear would have desired.

It's really quite simple. Even if you're out of practice you can tailor the game to fit your specific talents and interests. That way, there's nothing to stop you from discovering the truth behind people, society, and even the cosmos.

Still sapped for original institution-bending ideas? Well then, here's a few, just off the top of my head.

BISON RATS: Purchase a Galliker's diet iced tea in the convenience store, being sure to save the receipt. Smuggle the beverage into the main grill area, then proceed to take large, noisy gulps. If this fails to attract attention, say something like, "Boy! Even though my food isn't ready yet, I'm sure happy I have this refreshing iced tea to sip while I wait! What a swell school this is!" When officious green-shirted enforcers come over to arrest you, display your proof of purchase and laugh in their face.

Obviously, the above scenario would be a simplistic use of mild irony to question the power urge which drives naked capitalism.

MEMBERS OF C.A: Head down to lower level two of Bertrand while mumbling to yourself and looking stressed out. Grab a red bean bag chair and sling it over your shoulder Santa Claus style. Then, walk up and down the steps shouting "Ho! Ho! Ho!" Perhaps you might comment as to the fact that,"Between two rivers perfect children will eat poison Maraschino cherries and die early deaths! Ho! Ho! Ho!" If anyone tries to stop you, sentence them to eternal damnation.

Indeed, the subtle use of religious imagery prevalent in the previous situation will assist students in questioning the nature of their faith.

TEAM MEMBERS: Give clandestine interviews, asserting that group morale is low because, among other things, the coach uses too many "big words." Wait until the article is printed in the November 13, 1992 issue of The Bucknellian. Steal all the copies and dump them in a trash can fifty feet away where no one will ever find them. For extra fun, call up the reporter and threaten to poop in his shoes if he does it again.

Perhaps, the unadulterated brilliance of this deed will catalyst a campus-wide examination upon the gross fragility of our first amendment rights. Once again, raw lifting power and straight-passing might can be used to obfuscate our feeble quest for a non-existent truth.

SINGLE MEN: Find a conservative engineer who is apathetic about everything in life except his GPA and his doting, Soap-watching girlfriend who he plans to marry in rooke chapel one week after graduation. Every day you see him, ask him if he is still going out with "what's her name." Tell him you think his girlfriend is the most desirable woman in the whole wide world. Tell him you were thinking of changing you major to Education just so you could meet her. Ask him if she can do the splits. Inquire as to his opinions on "spouse swapping."

Yes, this slight bit of joshing may be just the thing to put a grin on your friend's face as he takes a moment to contemplate the humor which is human existence.

SINGLE WOMEN: Locate a man wearing a baseball cap. Inform him that you absolutely LOVE baseball caps. Ask him how he stumbled upon the innovative idea of wearing a baseball cap with a polo shirt. Ask him if he can do the splits. Offer him a maraschino cherry and wink suggestively. When he grumbles out a testosterine-dipped "yes," laugh in his face and walk away.

Hopefully, this zany turn around can help illustrate the sad state of gender relationships, tragically rooted in archetypal perceptions of strength and sexuality.

SPORTS FANS: Find a Bucknell football player. Ask him if he has a spare a copy of the November 13, 1992 issue of The Bucknellian which you can borrow. Inform him that for some strange reason, there's no more left. Run real fast.

Of course, this biting satirical sentiment will serve as an evolutionary litmus test. Enough said.

So you see, the time for experimentation has arrived once again. Your brilliant destruction of economic, religious, athletic, governmental, and gender institutions will help people to shed their defense mechanisms of self-importance. You'll win millions of friends as everyone will notice the wisdom behind your laughter. The world will live in peace. So go to it. As of now, the great stage of fools is bare.

Then again, keeping the tender rump of the lone clown in mind, maybe the stage should stay that way.

Therefore, you can not simply brush aside the Bible because people have not abided by it, nor do you have the license to draw conclusions about the Bible for the rest of us.

You have obviously drawn on the assumptions of some in our society for your analysis of the Bible and what it says about the environment. Contrary to these assertions, the Bible is not to blame for the destruction of the environment; in fact, through the Bible we realize how much God cares about the earth which he has made, and how much he desires his people to enjoy and be responsible caretakers of the earth (God, stated as "he" here is being used with the factual assumption that God is far more then our ideas of "he", "she" or "it"). There are many examples of God's love for the creation, just as there are many more examples of how the Bible, as the Word of God, stands faithful even when human beings are not faithful to God.

The other gross mistake that was present in your article was your assertion on what makes one a Christian. I am not from Pennsylvania and I know very little about Gov. Casey; but, I do know that being Pro-life does not make him "a good Christian soul." If he believes that Jesus Christ is Lord and Savior of his life and if he has submitted himself to God, then he may bear the name Christian. Again, this is all clearly explained in the Bible, but some, like yourself, are intent on blurring the issues and composing propaganda that meets your agenda without inviting communication.

However, this is the simple purpose of my letter: to invite communication. Communication not just from you, Mr. Barry, but from everyone on this campus. I challenge our entire community, here at Bucknell, to investigate Christianity for yourselves. If you found yourself agreeing or disagreeing with Mr. Barry last week, I ask you to ask yourself why you were doing so and why you have dealt with Christianity as you have up until now. I challenge you to seek out friends of yours who are (as Mr. Barry called us) "Born-again Christians" or "Catholic fundamentalists," and ask us what it is that we believe and why Jesus Christ is so important to us in our lives. I know that I have been, and will be, more then excited to share my life as a Christian with whoever is bold enough to inquire; and, I know that many of the other Christians on campus feel exactly the same. Please do not dismiss Mr. Barry's article or my letter, here, as another element of political rhetoric; rather, let these words be a challenge to you and how you have dealt with God. Mr. Barry, this letter is in no way meant to be a personal attack, my only attempt is to give people some "new ideas" to consider and to ask you to consider them as well.

It is for this reason that Jesus Christ becomes so vital for us as people. The Christian God is a Holy God (holy is best defined as 'otherness'-anything we are not He is, and that means He is perfect). Because we are imperfect, we cannot have any relationship with a perfect God. He will not interact with fallen man, though he desires to do so; and for that reason we are on our own, separated from God, knowing that there is a void in our life (as evidenced by drinking, drugs, sexual promiscuity, materialism—all efforts to fill that God-shaped void). Jesus Christ died on the cross for those sins and those behaviors that make us imperfect. By receiving him in faith, that void can be filled and one is given a right relationship with God, and with that, the ability to choose the morally preferable options in life. If you follow this path, you will have the desire and the ability to change your life to fit the Holy Scriptures, which is the only instruction manual for life that exists, and more adequately hold up the standards of environmentalism, gender roles, and social responsibilities as stated in the Bible. But you must read the Bible with the open mind you claim to have.

You may have doubts about the validity of the claims of Christianity. Please contact anyone in Christians in Action, or Fellowship of Christian Athletes and we can find information for you on anything from Creation to the Cross. We are not trying to mold you because we hate you. We are not trying to change you to fit our standards. You will never find a Christian who claims to be perfect. We want to introduce you to the TRUE Christian faith, not the one that is mangled on these pages every week, because we have experienced the joy of having a right relationship with God and we would love for you to have that joy.

ARTS AND ENTERTAINMENT

The fat lady ain't singing yet

BY ARA METJIAN
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Heather Jobson--The Bucknellian

Members the Bucknellian Opera Company (l to r) Eric Hodgson '94, Becky Lawson '95, Christy Rupert '95, and Lori Schoeneman '94 chat with company director Catherine Payn (seated). Tomorrow night's performance, moved from last year's stage at Tustin Studio to the larger Weis Center, reflects the growing popularity of the group.

Although they have been in their present program for only three years, the Bucknell Opera Company has rapidly found its place in the mainstream of Bucknell's culture. What used to be a mainly faculty organization, is now an actual class taught by Catherine Payn, assistant professor of music and director of the Company.

With its origins in the intimate Bucknell Hall, the Opera Company has had to move to larger performance centers to accommodate their ever increasing audience. This semester's company will perform in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. However, with their increased popularity comes a price. A frustrated Amy Anderson cries, "I wish we could stay in one place for more than a semester."

The Opera Company was composed in the spring of 1990 consisting of an ongoing multi-auditioned student membership. However, not all of the members are primarily music majors. Says biochemistry major Ken Laurora, '95, "I'm looking forward to my first performance because it's something I've enjoyed doing and it's something I've always wanted to do."

Students performing opera have the extra bonus of expanding their knowledge of literature, since most operas are derived from the classics. "The students integrate what they learned in literature with what they learned in theater, along with their singing," said Payn.

Along with the enhanced education that the students receive, they also learn to master their acting and singing abilities. Said John Caponegro '94, long-time member of the company, "It's very difficult to convey feeling, emotion, and thought while singing." Furthermore, he revealed that the singer gets to experience different scenes from different operas. Caponegro was first attracted to the Opera Company when he saw a dress rehearsal. Since then, he has held roles in Handel's Julius Caesar and Bizet's Carmen.

This year's Opera Company performance will include scenes from the following operas: L'Orfeo by Monteverdi; Cavalleria Rusticana by Mascagni and Tartuffe by Mechem. Oedipus Tex by P.D.Q. Bach will be performed in its entirety, however. L'Orfeo dating from the baroque era, recounts the trials and tribulation of the ill-fated lover Orpheus in his quest for Eurydice. Cavalleria tells of the naughty philandering of Turridu who leaves his girlfriend for his ex-lover, invoking the wrath of a jealous husband. Tartuffe is based on the play by Moliere, describing the con-artist Tartuffe who ensnares the Orgon household by his chicanery. Oedipus Tex is a complete spoof on the tragedy of Oedipus Rex, which is set in the Deep South.

Performer Amy Anderson '94 describes the night's performances as "wonderfully diverse, with both well-known and contemporary works to be performed."

Those that are unfamiliar with the art of opera are encouraged to come and learn. Most people conjure up the image of a fat lady with horns on her head screeching foreign arias This common misconception refers only to grand opera, that which Payn describes as "being only the tip of the iceberg when it comes to opera." The only two operas will be performed that are the close to grand operas will be the L'Orfeo and Cavalleria Rusticana, and all will be performed in English.

Included with this performance will be the first time that the Opera Company will cooperate with the Bucknell Concert Chorale and the Bucknell Brass Quintet. The Chorale will be integrated into the many of the pieces, and will be directed by William Payn, associate professor of music. The Bucknell Brass Quintet will be heard in Monteverdi's L'Orfeo. The Quintet will be directed by William Kenney, assistant professor of music.

The Opera Company will be performing on November 21 at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. All are invited to attend this culturally and educationally fulfilling night, as it is free of charge.

Concert Chorale performs in Weis

Members of the the concert chorale, directed by William Payn, associate professor of music, rehearse for their concert this Sunday. The concert closes out a series of weekend event in the Weis Center.

Bucknellian Staff Writer

A week of student musical productions at the Weis Center for the Performing Arts will come to a close this Sunday afternoon at 2:30. Under the direction of William A. Payn, associate professor of music and director of the choral studies, the Bucknell Concert Chorale will present its fall concert. Accompanying the chorale on the piano will be David Cover.

According to Payn, the concert will feature an array of musical styles, almost all of which will be contemporary. "The only piece not from the twentieth century is a piece by Felix Mendelssohn," said Payn. This piece, entitled "Heilig," will open the concert.

Vincent Persichetti's "Song of Peace, 82A" will follow the Mendelssohn piece. Commissioned by Colgate University for its chapel choir, Persichetti orginally wrote "Song of Peace" for male voices. The composer later revised it to include parts for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass.

"The chorale has enjoyed singing this piece," said Payn. "This is a very poignant piece of music based on an anonymous text which speaks of peace in our world."

The final piece in the first part of Sunday's program will be Edwin Fissinger's "Lux Aeterna." "I am particularly excited about this piece, which involves Assistant Professor of Music Catherine Payn as the soprano soloist," Payn stated. "This is an intriguing piece of music that works very well for the voices that we have and sounds excellent in the Weis Center."

Part II of Sunday afternoon's concert consists of three parts of "The Unicorn, the Gorgon, and the Manticore" by Gian Carlo Menotti. Payn explained that this piece, done in Madrigal Style, is the story of a strange man who lives in a castle and leads a unicorn around on a silver chain. "This is a difficult, interesting piece of music that shows the interaction between the man and the townspeople," Payn said. The chorale director added that the group will continue working on other parts of this piece next semester and will hopefully perform the piece in collaboration with the Bucknell Dance Company in the spring.

The third portion of the concert will feature two pieces of operatic literature. Pietro Mascagni's Cavalleria Rusticana will showcase John Caponegro '94 in the first movement's tenor solo. Soloista in the second movement will be soprano Amy Andersen '94 and alto Lisa Toccafondi '96. Ending the third portion of the program will be the prologue to Oedipus Tex by P.D.Q. Bach, edited by Peter Schickele. P.D.Q. Bach is a fictitous composer who contributes to the music world via the wit and musicality of Schickele. The chorale will be assisting the Bucknell Opera Company in the entirety of Oedipus Tex on Saturday night, also at the Weis Center.

Payn emphasized that, while certainly humorous, music by P.D.Q. Bach is by no means easy to sing. "In Oedipus Tex Schickele uses the recitative style (which tends to be very serious and similar to the spoken voice), yet he can put it in a humorous light," said Payn.

The final part of the program will consist of Duke Ellington's "It Don't Mean a Thing (If It Ain't Got That Swing)" and "Joshua Fit the Battle of Jericho," a traditional spiritual. The chorale typically ends its programs with a jazz-type number, and this concert is no exception.

"It is important to project a wide variety of literature onto my singers, especially a variety of American music, which these voices sing well," Payn commented. "We need to be aware of the American jazz idiom; we want it to be carried through the generations." Alto Amanda Swarr '95 will be the soloist in "Joshua Fit the Battle of Jericho."

Payn remarked that although Sunday afternoon's program is a short one, it is marked by literature that is both challenging and interesting. These challenges are well met by the chorale, which rehearses for roughly two hours a week. Payn was quick to praise his singers, saying, "In the amount of time we have, I think it's rather remarkable, the kind of programming these students can do."

The concert chorale is planning to tour Disney World in late May, following finals. This tour tentatively includes five performances, one

Photojournalism: Tearing down the Wall

BY CAROLINE STEVENS AND NICOLE PANICO
Bucknellian Staff Writers

"Freiheit!" Freedom. The basis for which democracy was founded. Freedom of religion, thought, press, individuality, and the right to pursue happiness. It is a rare commodity in human existence—even in the twentieth century.

Freedom is a gift that we United States citizens sometimes take for granted. For many others, it is something never known, or long forgotten. Such was the case with Germany. For this freedom, for this democracy, the people of East and West Germany risked their lives and livelihoods to destroy the remnants of Stalinism.

On November 9, 1989, in a bloodless revolution, the world witnessed the struggle for the German people to overthrow repression and the communist way of life they had known—all for the promise of freedom. On the anniversary of the beginning of Holocaust, November 9, 1938, the Berlin Wall came crashing down.

Three years later, the fall of the Iron Curtain inspires awe and hope in both the people living in democracy and the people living in tyranny and communism. This event unfolded before the world in all its breathtaking glory through modern television and photography.

Among the photojournalists who captured the rebirth of Unified Germany was Black Star. This team of prize-winning photojournalists immortalized, with exceptional photographic and artistic skill, the fear, the courage, the tears, the joy, and all the nationalistic splendor of the fall of the Berlin Wall, the symbol of political, economic, and personal repression.

Through the efforts of Black Star's photographers Christopher Morris, Joanna Pinneo, Ken Sakamoto, Anthony Suau, and David and Peter Trunley, the world was and is able to witness, in emotional and patriotic detail, the events of the reunification of Germany.

An exhibition of their photographs has been produced by Black Star Publishing Co. Inc. for the German Information Center in New York City. This display is on loan to Bucknell, and can be viewed on the second floor of the Ellen Bertrand Library.

"The Wall" display includes detailed still-life shots of the tearing down of Bradenburg Gate, border crossing at Potsdamer Platz, and the official Wall opening ceremony at Dstpreubendamm. Many of the photos captured the German people as they experienced the first stirrings of democratic freedom in over half a century.

The photographs tell a story; they tell history. With each picture, victory can be touched and human achievement can be celebrated. Through both the World Wars, the Vietnam War, and the Korean War, the world had yet to see such a monumental triumph as occured with the fall of the Wall. It represented the triumph of democracy over communism. It symbolized the triumph of freedom over repression.

"The Wall" exhibition captures these emotions, along with all the profound human dimensions of a monumental political, social, and economic upheaval. A miracle such as the reunification of Germany occurs once in a lifetime. This exhibition shows the world a souvenir of the fall of the Iron Curtain, and a promise—the possibility of a future with freedom for all.

Top off the week with "classic" films

BY GILLIAN WALDMAN AND NICOLE COBBAN
Bucknellian Staff Writers

Bucknell has been stereotyped by just about everyone as being generally in the middle of nowhere, removed completely from the outside world. Students are perceived as having little concern beyond the next J. Crew catalog or what fraternity parties to go to.

Okay, a good number of us do lead relatively sheltered lives, but then again, let's not overlook the fact that Bucknell is a not a school without a vast amount of hidden cultural opportunities. Hard to imagine in a town like Lewisburg, hundreds of miles from the a cosmopolitan city like New York, but it's true.

In addition to housing one of eastern Pennsylvania's largest cultural arts center, the Weis Center for Performing Arts, Bucknell offers a less formal, weekly display of culture, the Hilltop Film Series.

The Hilltop Films are shown every Friday afternoon at 4:30 p.m. and again at 8 p.m. in the Vaughan Literature Auditorium. American or foreign, old or new, these film are all meant to expose the audience to a variety of cultures and styles. Although shown for entertainment, not education, the audience always leaves having learned something.

The films are chosen by a committee of professors, including Karl Patten, professor of English, and then received through various distributors. Highly regarded as a top film programs, the Hilltop Film Series is recognized by film distributors as a unique event for college campuses. Patten remarked that when calling to order films for this year, the distributor stated that Bucknell had the second best film program in the state of Pennsylvania, second only to Carnegie Mellon.

However, despite the fame of the program with distributors, the film series suffers from almost complete anonymity on campus. The films, which focus on more 'classic' pieces, rarely venture into the mainstream blockbuster hits. Patten cautions, though, that a film need not be old to be classic. Last year's lineup included Jesus of Montreal and Mystery Train, two films released in 1989 but already considered to be classics.

There is no strict guideline in choosing the films, only that "they be good," said Patten. The committee will consider any film that will help to round out a student's education and expose them, according to Patten, to "the kinds of films people ought to see. It makes their education a great deal richer."

The next film to be shown is Ginger and Fred, an Italian film about two dancers who are poor imitations of Ginger Rogers and Fred Astaire. Ginger and Fred will be shown on December 4.

If this article has sparked your interest, check it out. The 4:30 showing, which typically draws more students than the 8 p.m., still affords plenty of time to go out afterwards. And the 8 p.m. showing offers the perfect opportunity for dinner and a movie. Either way, the Hilltop Film Series is one that should be explored for what it can offer not only as a cultural medium, but as a highly entertaining one as well.

Match the building with the person for whom it was named.

It's time to test your knowledge on the origin of building names. This week's section: downhill residence halls, home to first-year students.

In addition to the freshman halls, the downhill dorms also house the residential colleges in Smith and Carey House.

How freshmen and upperclassmen alike may not realize is the history behind each building. How do you compare?

1. Larison: One of the oldest freshman dorms, Larison Hall was named after Mrs. Katherine B. Larison in June, 1927 by the Board of Trustees. Larison was the principle of the Female Institute 1882-1897. ☐

2. Hulley: This house was purchased from Delta Sigma fraternity, and was named for professor Hulley, teacher of History 1893-1904, and then member of the Board of Trustees. ☐

3. Harris: Harris Hall was named in 1927 for Dr. John Harris, President of the University 1889-1919. Following his term as president, Harris became a professor of philosophy until 1927. One interesting tidbit about Harris Hall: its third floor was originally a gymnasium. ☐

4. Carey House: Built in 1935, Carey House was named after Anna R. Carey, Dean of Women 1919-1925. Today Carey House houses both freshmen and upperclassmen ☐

Cocktail hour hits Tustin Theatre

BY CHRISTY D'AMBROSIO
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Mary Jordan '93 (r) directs Jessica Alexander '95 in This Property is Condemned, the fourth play to be performed as part of the Cocktail Series. The final directing project of TH240, the plays give students the chance to learn the art of directing through the hands-on experience of producing a one-act play in Tustin Studio Theatre.

Ron Howard, Penny Marshall and Jody Foster all are famous directors. If you ever wanted to join their ranks, here is your chance. The Theatre and Dance Department is offering a 200 level course called, "Cocktails—Intro to Directing." This is your opportunity to become a star. Professor Bob Gainer instructs this course in the hopes that the "students learn about the craft of acting and the art of directing."

During the first two-thirds of the class, the students explore the skills, research and analysis of theater. The last one-third of the class is an intense lab experience with the end result being one-act plays directed by each student.

A lasting tradition at Bucknell, the "Cocktails" theater opens this year's season tonight in Tustin Studio Theatre. Receiving its name from the informal atmosphere and 5 o'clock-'cocktail'-hour performance time, the one-act plays have always offered the campus the opportunity to watch their fellow students at work.

The only prerequisite of this course is that each student take an acting course and take part as an actor in a play. The course is mainly for theatre majors, although students have included non-majors who, "understand the process of what it means to act," said Gainer.

Brian Sipes—The Bucknellian

Jessica Alexander '95 in This Property is Condemned.

The logic behind the acting prerequisite is that the student needs to understand what it is like to work with actors, and more importantly how to think from an actor's point of view. Since acting is a skill that can't solely be taught, experience is the best way to gain the instincts of a performer. Having an actor's experience makes directing all the more exciting.

"Cocktails" has been a long tradition at Bucknell which was started by Harvey Powers. Head of the theatre program when he began the course, Powers is also quite responsible for its growth. Gainer later inherited the position of instructing this 200 level course. He teaches several theatre courses, including the required Acting I, along with directing one play a year. Thus, this course parallels what he does. He is "Practicing what he preaches."

There are many benefits that go taking this course. The primary learning activity is "how one frees and liberates the creative expression of the actor to express the dramatic poet intentions in the play," says Gainer.

Another benefit to this course is that the student learns skills that he/she will use in his/her future. According to Gainer, "this is an important role to explore because the student is not only a director, but also a leader, guide and an educator."

If students find themselves drawn to further exploration of acting, they are able to participate in Cap & Dagger by directing workshop in January. After that, a senior can propose a mainstage production. Students who have gone further into directing after taking this course are; Brian Clark '92 who directed The Crucible and Rosa Joshi '89 who recently entered Yale's prestigious directing program.

This month begins the "cocktail" hour. Starting tonight in the Tustin Studio Theatre, the students of this semester's course will be producing their one-act plays. Come check out the future Ron Howard's and Penny Marshall's of the directing industry. Everyone is invited to attend and the admission is free.

A seaworthy semester on the big blue

BY KATE FINK
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Ahoy! The S.S. Universe is about to set sail! Grab your cameras, tour manuals, plaid shorts and your dark knee socks and jump aboard! The current voyage will pass through Japan, Taiwan, Malaysia, India, Egypt, Turkey, Ukraine, Spain, Venezuela and the Bahamas before heading back to the U.S. port in New Orleans.

But this is no ordinary cruise ship. This is Semester at Sea—a floating classroom that offers the opportunity to travel the world with 450 to 500 students from around the nation. Courses are taken while at sea, in classrooms with closed circuit television capabilities, that are integrated with the areas of travel. Each class involves field study that can be completed while in port.

The ship's facilities include a library, theater, student union, cafeteria, swimming pool, basketball and volleyball courts, and a weight room, providing students with a university away from their university. In the five to seven days usually allotted at each port, students are free to explore the country as they wish. Structured travel opportunities offered by the program. Students have participated in home stays with families, visits to universities, travels to places of cultural and historical interest, and impromptu adventures in cities and rural areas.

"Semester at Sea was the best experience of my entire life," said Bob Marks '93, who spent Spring of 1992 on the S.S. Universe, "It was an incredible opportunity to go around the world and to see different cultures first hand. It was life changing. It really gave me an appreciation for what we have in the United States."

According to Marks, the most valuable knowledge was gained from foreign students. The port cities often held welcome receptions, and the interactions there gave insight into the perspectives of young people in other countries. Marks was enlightened as to how people in different positions in the world view global and local political events and how these events affect them.

Suzi Merselis '93, who voyaged in the fall of '91, agrees, "I spent a lot of my traveling time in youth hostels where I met students from all over the world. I learned a lot from them staying up late and just talking."

It was not difficult to communicate, as English has become a fairly universal second language. In areas where verbal communication was not possible, such as in parts of India or Africa, it was possible to get by on hand gestures or pictures.

Some might question the value of such short stays at each port, which do not allow the cultural integration that living an entire semester in one country does. But Marks stresses the extraordinary amount of insight he gained from the experience, "I think I am more versed in the world because I don't have just one country's perspective."

The classes on the ship acquainted the students with the customs, the culture, and political systems and issues pertaining to each country. They inspired the students to want to learn, and the port visits deeply reinforced the classroom information. Although it might seem that such a "whirlwind" tour would create an information overload where details might be forgotten and experiences would blend together, Marks maintains, "I will never forget what I learned. I have been inspired to take more International Relations classes and these classes have been enhanced greatly by my travels. I can now apply so much of what I am learning to what I already know." In fact, Marks believes so firmly in the program that he thinks it should be a requirement for all IR majors.

Merselis agrees that students should take advantage of this unique opportunity. "At Semester at Sea, you really get to know the professors well. They were very enthusiastic because a new set of faculty is on board each semester. They were fresh and really wanted to be there. One of the courses I took was the best course I have taken at college yet."

Marks and Merselis both related fascinating anecdotes to their travels. They safaried in Kenya and Tanzania where they raced with cheetahs, saw giraffes eat off of their porches, saw elephant fossils and families, and watched zebras mating. Merselis had a scary taxi ride in a bad area of Brazil where her window was smashed by an angry Brazilian, and flew on a bizarre airplane in China, where chickens made up part of the passenger list. Flights in India were often interrupted by bomb checks. In China, her room was filmed and her group was constantly being followed by curious Chinese people because the size of her group aroused suspicion.

Eating was also an experience to remember. Said Merselis, "I ate some gross food. Once I ate this soup and found a chicken head in it. I ate dog meat and brains of something, I don't even know what!"

Neither student could explain in words how wonderful the experience was. Said Marks, "I just learned so much. Whenever I hear about a port I was in, my ears perk and my eyes light up. I think this was one of the best, if not the best, educational gifts my parents ever gave to me."

If you are interested in learning more about the program, contact either Bob or Suzi. Merselis has official Semester at Sea information and application literature. You can also phone,—800-854-0195, or write: Semester at Sea, University of Pittsburgh, 811 William Pitt Union, Pittsburgh, Pa 15260.

Good food, good view, great prices

BY SCOTT DONALDSON AND SUSAN SMITH
Bucknellian Staff Writer

As a rule, restaurants with a view usually hope that their scenic overlook will substitute for substantial food and service. To our surprise, Tedd's on the Hill had a good view (even if it is of Sunbury), good food, and good prices.

Located above Tedd's Landing where the two branches of the Susquehanna merge and where Route 11 branches from Route 15, we could see the river before sunset and the twinkling lights of the Sunbury skyline after moonlight. Either scene was pretty from high atop the hill.

The atmosphere inside the restaurant, although simple, was also nice. While the chairs and tables are banquetroom style, the almost ceiling to floor length windows and fish and hook patterned tablclothes gave legitimacy to the name, "River Room."

The fishing motif was carried into the meal as service began with a woven wicker fishing basket filled with bread, rolls and toasted rye chips. Carrots and dip, which reminded us of the appetizers served on The Wonder Years, also arrived at our table. While old-fashioned, they were an enjoyable combination.

Scott was especially pleased with the salad, which also came as a part of the meal. Loaded with sliced mushroooms, he even went as far to say that it made up for the lack of appetizers on the menu.

Out of the dozen or so choices for dinner entrees, we decided to try the stuffed flounder with crabmeat and special cheese sauce ($13.95) and the pork tenderloin teriyaki ($12.50). Both were served with the chef's choice of potato and vegetable, which were new potatos and fresh green beans that night. Like the atmosphere, the food was also simple but pleasing. The fish was fresh, the teriyaki sauce glazed and tangy.

Dessert was also included with our dinners. Scott sampled the carrot cake, complete with a little carrot of icing on top and Susan tried the cheesecake which was covered with a thin layer of creamcheese and strawberry sauce. Despite claiming to be full, we finished both desserts.

Tedd's on the Hill receives our recommendation. Maybe make some reservations there for a nice dinner before the Sunday night Christmas candlelight service.

Reservations are appreciated at Tedd's on the Hill. Call 743-1591. It is open Friday and Saturday night from 5-9 p.m. and Sunday from 11:30 a.m.-3 p.m.

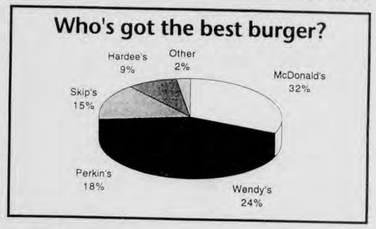
The best in fast food



BY KRISTINA SCHURR
Bucknellian Staff Writer

Where do Bucknellians go when they want to eat something fast, easy, and not too expensive? And what is more important? Taste, quality, or simply what the bank account allows for? The Bucknellian conducted a survey of 125 students in order to determine just where to find the best in fast food near campus.

Students were asked which franchise made the best hamburger. The winner was McDonald's, with 30% of the responses. Sixty percent of the students surveyed also felt that McDonald's had the lowest prices. No wonder over 55 billion have been served! Next in line was Wendy's, which attracted 24% of the best burger votes.

And with a great burger...comes french fries. Again, McDonald's was the clear winner with 48% of the vote. With 30% of the vote, Hardee's took second in the fry category.

Accompanying any great burger/fry combo is something to wash it all down with: a milkshake. McDonald's takes it again with 37% of the responses. One might begin to wonder whether the secret to fast food cuisine is hidden in those Golden Arches. Thirty percent of the respondents opted for Perkin's shakes, giving the family restaurant chain second place.

It was difficult to compete with Perkin's for overall best food variety, said 66% of the respondents. And a whopping 64% decided that the late-night menu was unbeatable.

And what about atmosphere and service? Perkin's was number one in these two categories, as well. Too bad Perkin's prices are so expensive. They are second highest—right after Skip's, according to students.

On the flip side of the fast food eating scale is Hardee's. Hardee's did not fare well on the burger or french fry scale (about 8% for both), but it came in second for both late-night food and lowest prices. For those who can't afford a late-night break at Perkin's, or who have a case of the munchies, Hardee's is your place.

And what about Skip's? Our respondents felt that the prices were too high, service was bad (receiving a mere 7% of Best Service responses), and milkshakes were scooped from the bottom of the barrel.

The fast food survey was conducted by Caryn Akelaitis '95, Carissa Itle '95, Nancy Norbeck '93, and Kristina Schurr '95.

In what is surely the most recent of all dental surveys, 3 out of 5 dentists refuse to particpate in another survey stating that the abundance of surveys by the toothpast industry had just plain worn them out.

Men's X-country places 8th at IC4A meet

Women run competitively in Bethlehem, fall to more experienced foes; Bucknell's freshmen and sophomores to run at junior nationals

BY CHRIS DROWNE
Bucknellian Staff Writer

This past weekend Bucknell's men's and women's cross country teams both ran at the IC4A Championships, although the successes for these squads were judged on different levels.

For most cross country programs, the Bison men's 1992 campaign would've been considered a "great" fall—they were undefeated, won their 18th consecutive league title, and finished in the regional top ten.

But, for a program which sets its sights and goals on a national level, it was simply a "very good" year. It's all relative.

An eighth-place region II finish at Lehigh would be a fine meet for some, but it's only considered "good" in Lewisburg.

That's not a negative, though. In fact, that's something that Bucknell should be proud of. The team is at the national level to stay.

"In order to go to nationals, you have to have everybody run an optimal race," said head coach Art Gulden.

Women's cross country captain Kristen Opdyke '93 is pictured above running against league competition in an outdoor track event last year. Opdyke has lead by example by being the first Bucknell women's runner to cross the finish line at every meet.

"We didn't do that on the day we needed to, but that doesn't ruin our season. It was a good meet and a good year."

Villanova, Georgetown, Navy, and Cornell will all be going to nationals based on their top four finishes at the meet. Cornell's performance was a bit of a shock, but it ran the optimal race that Gulden referred to before.

Individually, tri-captain Tom Eagleson '93 ran "very good and at about his potential level," said Gulden.

Eagleson finished 25th overall with a time of 31:20.1.

Where the Bison really were hurt was when "the others didn't reach that potential," according to Gulden. That may sound a bit harsh, but remember, it's all relative.

Fellow tri-captain Judd Jarden '93 placed 49th at 31:54.8, while Jim Farrer '93, who is mainly a mile specialist, showed a lot in the long, tough race and finished 61st. Classmate Mike Bronson '93 was right on his heels and placed 66th.

"I think we were unsure of ourselves and not as confident as we needed to be," reflected Gulden, as he timed practice runs yesterday afternoon. "We now know what we could've done because the opportunities were there for us, but it's a little late. I'd love to run this race again."

Does the fact that all of these runners will leave campus this June worry Gulden?

It shouldn't. The Bison program doesn't rebuild, it reloads.

The coming Track Athletic Congress' Junior Nationals will show just how much reloading needs to be done to keep the program at the national level. The team's freshmen and sophomores will be going to Wisconsin to compete there, and this will be the first step in the maturation process of going from competitor to winner.

"This is a high-pressure race early in someone's career," said Gulden. "However, we belong at and should race to win this meet because we're good enough. This is essentially next year's varsity squad. This is the opportunity to get the perception that we belong at the national level. We have to be aggressive to show how much we're looking forward to next year and Lehigh."

Bucknell's program has proven this fall that it belongs at the national level. For that reason, its great season is only considered very good.

The women's cross country team, meanwhile, reached a new level this past weekend when it participated at Lehigh in the Eastern regional championship race.

"Participated," of course, is the key word.

"We were intimidated, but that's natural for being at this national level for the first time," said head coach Art Gulden.

National level, indeed. Five of the top ten and seven of the nation's top twenty teams were also running in Bethlehem.

"We are a much-improved program, but we need to go from just participating at that level to competing at that level," said Gulden. "This was a good year and we did pretty well though, because we did reach that next level."

Bucknell, it should be said, did not finish last. In fact, it beat four teams and "probably should've beaten ten," according to Gulden.

Kristen Opdyke '93 ran a true captain's race by finishing in the individual top 50.

"She [Opdyke] went out too quickly and found herself running with the top-ranked Villanova women," explained Gulden.

Opdyke's 47th-place time of 17:58.3 was over 70 spots ahead of the next Bison finisher, Kathy Wurster '94. Maria Ryan '96, Becky Tobin '95, and Jessica Wilhelm '95 rounded out Buck-

The only pre-season warm-up for the men's basketball team will be next week on Nov. 28 vs. the Ukranian National Team.

The Ukranians, who are currently in the midst of a 12-game tour of the United States, will feature four players who are 6-7 or taller.

Included on the National Team's schedule before its meeting with the Breakin' Bison over Thanksgiving Break are teams from Alabama, Tennessee, and Kentucky.

Bucknell's wrestling team, which opens its 1992-93 season tomorrow at the East Stroudsburg Open, recently named Phil Elliott '93, Bob Ferraro '94, George Swann '93, and Mike Van Doren '91 as its four captains for the winter.

Elliott is rated 16th in the nation by Wrestling USA, and posted a 13-16-1 record for 1991. This mark includes a 4-2-1 showing that the senior made after moving down to the 134-pound level of competition, and this is the class at which Elliott will start the '92 campaign.

Ferraro is ranked seventh in the nation at 190 pounds and was champion of this weight class last season, when he finished at 29-4-1.

Swann was co-winner of the squad's Most Improved Wrestler Award last year, and finished 2-2 in the ECWA Championships.

The final captain for the Bison, Van Doren, is a graduate student and is the only returning captain from last year's team. Van Doren won Bucknell's Most Valuable Wrestler Award in 1991, posted a 12-6 record at 150 pounds, and has a 54-28 career mark at Bucknell. Wrestling USA ranks the graduate 17th in the nation in his weight class.

The Bison men's lacrosse squad has named Rick Herrema '93, Gabe Portuondo '93, and Todd Streelman '93 as the tri-captains for its 1993 spring season.

Herrema, a midfielder who tallied eight goals and two assists last year, has 20 career goals for Bucknell.

Defenseman Portuondo is a three-year letter winner for the team and boasts the most experience in the Bison defense.

Attacker Streelman contributed nine goals and 16 assists, and comes into Bucknell's spring campaign with 74 career points for the team (30 goals and 44 assists).

Wrestling in the 177 lb. weight class, tri-captain Bob Ferraro '94, who finished last season with a stellar 29-4-1 record, will look to dominate his opponents in the Bison's 1992-1993 season.

Lady Spikers swept out of league tourney

Middle blocker Katie Steele '96 was the pillar of strength for the 4-22 Lady Spikers. She was recognized for her sensational rookie season by being named to the 1992 All-Patriot League Team.

"Memories, of a time we left behind..."

This can be the common ballad heard amongst the members of the women's volleyball team after they unceremoniously exited the Patriot League tournament last weekend to end a dismal 4-24 season.

The tourney was the perfect setting for the Bison to dispel all thoughts that they were an ill-equipped team, and the final time for the squad to prove to themselves and to its opponents that it was better than its 4-22 record would indicate.

Bucknell opened at the double-elimination championship at Holy Cross against the third-seeded Red Raiders from Colgate.

"We came out really strong against Colgate," said Laura Spinney '95. "We were really excited and really ready to play."

As the first game got under way, this became evident as the Lady Spikers knocked their opponents in red on their heels, 15-12.

"I think that we played with a lot of heart," said middle blocker Katie Steele '96.

Unfortunately for the Orange and Blue, a little more than heart was needed on that afternoon in Worcester. Colgate regained its footing in the second game to squeak past the Orange and Blue squad, 15-11.

The Bison needed a gut check here—to rebound from the loss and continue to press Colgate. The time was not right for a Bucknell upset, though, as the Raiders brushed off the squad 15-4 and 15-3.

"We let them take control," commented Spinney on the team's play. "We fell behind and couldn't get back in the saddle."

Setter Brenda Hayduk '96 played well and assisted outside hitter Heather Hoehn '94, who recorded 13 kills for the four-game match. The team's steady defense was anchored by Hoehn, Hayduk and Amy Miller '95, who earned all-tournament honors for her inspired display of talent.

The team's sporadic play in the first match, unfortunately, carried over to

The following are the answers to last week's sports trivia questions:

1. David "Whitey" Berardinelli '93 and Lisa Fink '93 are the two Bucknell Academic All-Americans (of six) who are remaining on campus.

Infielder and guard Lisa Fink '93

• One of the football teams tri-captains this year, Berardinelli garnered Academic All-America honors by hauling in 46 receptions totalling 769 yards for a 16.5 yard per catch average. He also scored six touchdowns for the 1-9 Bison.

• A starting infielder for the Lady Bison softball team, Fink earned the Academic All-America honor after the 1992 season after she hit .344 with one homerun, 17 runs batted in, eight doubles, two triples and 20 stolen bases in 22 attempts.

2. Pat King '92, Matt Deardorff '92, Bob Kelly '92 and Jim Zervanos '92 are the four remaining Bucknellians to receive Academic All-American honor for the 1991-92 seasons.

• Men's basketball forward, co-captain and Patriot League Player of the Year King set the Patriot Legaue on its ear last year by tallying a 20.3 points per game average. He shot .625 for the floor and .840 from the charity stripe. He scored 610 points total last season which places him second on Bucknell's all-time list for points scored in a single season. He is currently playing basketball in Europe for the TTL Bamberg team.

X-country runner Bob Kelly '92

• Men's cross country co-captains Deardorff and Kelly helped pace the harriers to a thirteenth place finish in the NCAA Championships last year. For their outstanding achievements in and out of the classroom, these scholar-athletes were recognized by Sports Illustrated.

• Baseball player Zervanos earned All-League honors as well as Academic All-America status in his senior season compiling a .336 batting average along with a .439 slugging percentage and hitting one homerun, knocking in 18 and tallying two doubles and one triple.

3. The men's cross country team has won 18 straight conference championships. The first fifteen came while the team was a part of the East Coast Conference and the last three have occurred since the team became members of the Patriot League.

7. Baseball pitcher Don Richards '56 is the Bison ballplayer who holds the career and single season strikeout records for Bucknell's baseball team. The hard throwing left-hander struck out 140 batters during the 1955 spring season. Over his three-year career spanning from 1954-1956, Richards totaled 340 Ks. He once fanned 21 batters in a single game.

INTRAMURAL GAME OF THE WEEK

This past Monday night in the fieldhouse, Theta Chi went down without much resistance to Lambda Chi Alpha in racquetball, 4-0. Usually the intramural matches in this sport are scheduled for five games (three singles and two doubles); however, this particular contest was cut short when the participants realized that they were playing in an earthquake simulation testing chamber rather than a racquetball court. Players immediately ran screaming from the premises, but eventually bucked up the courage to go to the University's Recreation Office and report the score for the record. There, officials explained to the players that their fear was unnecessary, since they in fact had been competing within the confines of a wind tunnel. Seen above is Theta Chi's Todd Haldeman '94 as he prepares to serve to his Lambda Chi opponent.

"After we lost that [game] we lost our intensity because we knew that we were out of the championship," explained Spinney.

With a chance of the league crown out of their grasp, the Lady Spikers had to focus on their next opponent, a team which they had defeated earlier in the season— Fordham.

"I think that we were equal to them," said Steele. "I don't think that they were a better team, I think that they just played better than we did last weekend. We couldn't get anything to click."

The Bison knocked heads with the Rams and, while the outcome was the same, the Lady Spikers were not dominated. After a 15-10 loss in game one, Bucknell came back to take the second stanza by a 15-9 count.

Yet, a comeback was averted as the New Yorkers sent the Orange and Blue reeling to a 15-5 and 15-11 doom to end the match and the season for the squad.

That was it, and the show was over.

"I think that we finally realized at the end of the season that we have good potential, that we can win. I think that we just realized it too late," said Spinney.

But there's always next year—a season which the members of the team are approaching very optimistically.

"I think we have great deal of potential for next year," said Steele, "and we're a young team with so much talent."

Steele is one of the many talented players returning. In just her rookie season, she led the Bison in most offensive categories and received recognition for her accomplishments with All-Patriot League honors.

With the loss of only one senior (Sarah Mesaros '93) and the experience that the young team gained this season, the Lady Spikers could provide fierce opposition to all who stand in their path during the 1993 season. All optimists should get their season tickets now.

nell's scoring, all of them finishing in the top 170.

Unlike the men, the women's season is now over. Fortunately, though, the team is also different from the men's because it will return all but one runner next fall.

While the loss of Opdyke is significant, the experience should be there to not only participate at the national level, but to compete and win there.

MEN'S

Many Bucknellians remember the last time the Bison men's basketball team was in action. It was the Patriot League Championship game last March at Lehigh, and the Breakin' Bison were up against Fordham for the title with an NCAA tournament berth on the line. If you did not make the road trip to Stabler Arena, you watched it on ESPN. You probably remember the seesaw nature of the game, and a Paul Olkowski '93 court-length three-pointer at the buzzer.

You also probably remember that the Bison lost the game, 70-65.

Despite this defeat, the Bison emerged from the 1991-92 season with much to be proud of, including a 21-9 record and a tie for first in the Patriot League.

Now with the loss of Patrick King '92 and Bill Courtney '92, one might wonder if the team can continue its success—after all, these two outstanding players accounted for 47 percent of Bucknell's scoring. King was last year's Patriot League Most Valuable Player, and he led the Bison in scoring, rebounding, field-goal shooting, and free-throws. Courtney was a two-time First-Team All-Patriot League selection and ranks fifth in Bucknell history in the categories of career scoring and assists.

How will coach Charlie Woollum, in his seventeenth year with the team, replace Courtney and King?

"We're not going to replace Bill and Pat," said coach Woollum. "I don't expect two new guys to do exactly what they did. We need to develop a new team identity."

With twelve returning members and four first-year players, Woollum should have no problem developing that new team identity and picking up right where he and the Bison left off.

The 1992-93 squad consists of three returning starters in Mike Bright '93, Olkowski, and Chris Simpson '94. Bright was a pre-season All-Patriot League selection according to Street and Smith's, and he ranks first among Bucknell's returning players in points, rebounds, steals, and blocked shots per game.

Forward Anne McGovern '93 works on her game in practice earlier this week.

Olkowski returns for his third season as a starter, after averaging 10.3 points and 7.2 rebounds per game last season, adding more experience to the Bison starting five.

"When I was a freshman, I hoped to start my junior year," commented Olkowski. "When I started during my sophomore year, it was even better." Junior guard Simpson worked into a starting position as a sophomore last year, averaging 9.2 points per game.

The two starting spots vacated by King and Courtney will be filled by forward Ray Brown '94 and guard Russell Peyton '93. Brown saw quite a bit of action last season, playing probably two of his finest games during the Patriot League tournament.

Peyton, despite playing just under twenty minutes a game, still led the Bison with 3.9 assists per game and ranked second in steals with 45.

Off the bench, the Bison are a young team. The remaining returning players include guards Matt Clark '93, Jason Janego '94, and Mark Matthews '94. Woollum will have Pat Hook '94, Matt Sloan '95, and Mike Walsh '93 at forward, and Bryan Eisert '94 will fill the center position when Olkowski is not in the game.

Bucknell also has four outstanding freshmen this season, to whom Woollum will look in the coming years to lead the team. Kihlon Golden '96, Sekou Hamer '96, Dave Steigerwald '96, and Kevin Wenk '96 all look promising thus far.

"I'm pleased with the freshmen, but they are only freshmen," said Woollum. "But I expect them all to be good in four years."

The Bison wasted no time in starting their practices with the Midnight Madness inter-squad scrimmage game on Nov. 1, the first day permitted by the NCAA. This new date was nearly three weeks later than it used to be, cutting crucial weeks off of the practice schedule.

Freshman Golden said, "Starting two to three weeks late doesn't help at all. All of the younger guys need to learn just that much faster."

This puts a lot of pressure on the team, and all squad members need to work hard to prepare for the season.

"We need to get more done in less time," said Peyton. "How hard we work now determines what happens in the end."

The Bison will get the chance to see if their hard work pays off when they open the 1992-93 season on Tuesday, Dec. 1 at home against Mount St. Mary's.

The new team with the new identity just might end up with a new Patriot League title, although surging teams from Holy Cross and Fordham may have something to say about that.

Now with the loss of Patrick King '92 and Bill Courtney '92, one might wonder if the team can continue its success—after all, these two outstanding players accounted for 47 percent of Bucknell's scoring.

WOMEN'S

Bucknell's women's basketball team is coming off of the 1991-92 season on a very strong note.

First-year coach Juliene Simpson took a struggling Bison team last year and led them to produce an improved 7-20 record. At the end of the season, the squad's overall mark did not reflect its level of play, as it was victorious in four of its last seven games and three of its last four.

In addition, eleven of the Lady Bison's twenty losses were by nine or fewer points.

"[Our record] had a lot to do with the past," said coach Simpson. "Going two, three years with only winning 'x' amount of games—It took us a while to get the confidence up. While many teams were coming together and doing well in the middle of January, we began to do very well in February. We really started to come around those last seven or eight games."

As the Bison kick off their 1992-93 season in a little over a week, both the coach and the players anticipate even more improvement.

"Last year was a year of learning," pointed out Lisa Fink '93. "We're starting this year so much farther ahead."

With one season with a new coach under its belt and many returning players, the team should definitely see more wins.

"I think we will take the next step," said Simpson. "We're in the middle of the pack—everybody's picked us to be in the middle of the pack—and that's a great spot to start. Realistically, I think we can move ourselves up."

With four out of five starters returning and nine returning letter winners overall, this year's Bison squad looks almost identical to the one from a year ago. Lisa Fink '93 and Kelly Dee '94 will start in the backcourt for the Orange and Blue, while Anne McGovern '93, Juliet McGee '93, and Nicole Reffner '95 will close out the experienced starting five, who have eleven years of experience between them.

Senior forward McGee led the Patriot League in rebounding (254) and she was the league's fifth leading scorer, averaging 14.9 points per game. Off the bench, look for appearances from K.C. Vlah '96, Joy Sandler '92, Lauren Wagner '96, Casey Hollister '96, and Monica Nawarskas '94.

Other returning players include Kelly Kempton '93 and Erin McCoy '94. Newcomers beside Vlah, Wagner, and Hollister include Kelly Corr '95, Jen Phillips '96, and Katie Steele '96.

"We are a lot deeper this year," said Fink, who is one of Bucknell's tri-captains along with McGee and Sandler. "We will be able to sub more freely, and give a lot of people a lot of playing time."

"I think they're all outstanding, and that all will contribute this year a great deal," said Simpson. "I am looking forward to the seniors starting the season off for us with their experience, and by conference time we will need the freshmen coming in and playing minutes for us, and I think that they will be able to do that."

The fact that over half of the team will be composed of returning players should make it that much easier to continue the improvement from the end of last season.

"Last year we did the very basic offense, very basic defense. This season will be better with regards to what we will be able to do," commented coach Simpson.

Bucknellians will see just what the Bison will be able to do when they open their season Dec. 1 at St. Bonaventure. The home opener for the women will take place Dec. 7 in Davis Gym when they host Cornell.

"I think surprise is the best thing going for us," said McGee. "We've got many of our players back, four great recruits, and no more injuries."

Forward tri-captain Mike Bright '93 will be expected to carry the scoring load due to the absence of Pat King '92 and Bill Courtney '92 this winter. The three-year starter averaged 14.9 points per game last season.

Tri-captain guard Russell Peyton '93 moves downcourt as Sekou Hamer '96 looks on. The two will hope to direct the Breakin' Bison to an NCAA tournament berth next March. The campaign for the men's basketball squad begins on Nov. 28 with a pre-season metting with the Ukranian National Team.

win on the three-meter board. He posted a score of 268.65, a personal best by 30 points. Carr also managed another personal best of 240.53 by taking second place on the one-meter board while teammate Carl Weisfelder '95 placed fourth.

The Bison men were also triumphant in the 1000-yard freestyle with a swift 9:56.81 from Stew Harris '95, and Steve Droste '93 touching the wall first for the 200 backstroke.

In addition to the wins, Bucknell posted many impressive times. Dietrich Conze '94 brought in points for second place in the 200 freestyle and third in the 500 freestyle with commendable times of 1:46.90 and 4:53.96, respectively.

Harris, not far behind, finished fourth in the 500. In other events for the Bison, Heath Smith '94 grabbed third in the 200 IM and fourth in the 200 backstroke while Sloan Broderick '96 placed fourth in the 200 freestyle and John Dillon took fourth in the 200 butterfly.

Doug Reid '95 touched the wall third in the 200 breaststroke followed closely by Eric McCabe '95 (fourth) and Adam Weiss '96 (fifth).

The Bucknell relays also fared well with a third for the medley relay team of Smith, Reid, Kevin Kendall '96, and Dave McGeorge '94. For the final event of the meet, the freestyle relay team of Conze, Droste, Broderick, and Mike Watkinson '96 swam a notable time of 3:15.69 for second place with the team of Peter Spaulding '96, Kendall, Harris, and McGeorge finishing third.

Having a full week of intense workouts behind them, the Bison men travel to Bloomsburg to face the Huskies tomorrow hoping to improve upon their winless record.

Smile!

All-Blacks ice Frostburg, 46-0

Women's club rugby team rounds out fall with 5-1 record after another shutout victory

Brenda Barron '96 and Kerri Steckler '93 (in black) battle for the ball in a scrum against Frostburg this past Saturday. Bucknell won, 46-0.

This past Saturday, the mid-November weather was not the only coldness felt on the Mod fields for the opponents of Bucknell's women's club rugby team.

The All-Blacks sent Frostburg University home with a chilling 46-0 defeat, thereby finishing off its fall season with a sterling 5-1 record.

Team captain Kerri Steckler '93 described the victory as "a fun game in which we were able to use our skills and come out on top."

The tries started early in the game for Bucknell, as evidenced by the 12 points that were scored in the first half alone. One of the tries were contributed by team coach Kathy Hafer and the other by Holly Fisher '96.

A two-point conversion kick was tacked on by Kristie Robson '95. Even with this lead, however, the Bucknell women were not satisfied.

After a good screaming pep talk by the captains and coach, the team went into the second half charged up and ready to finish off Frostburg, who was already trailing 12-0.

The remainder of the match was simply a barrage of tries after tries. Scoring contributors included Hafer with another three tries, and Dawn Soisson '96, Julie Grammont '93, and Robson with one each. In addition, Robson added two more conversion kicks.

Long before the game was over, the visitors had realized that the All-Blacks were unstoppable on the day. Frostburg crossed the 50-yard line only three times, and in each of those instances Bucknell either pushed its opponents back or simply stole the ball.

On one occasion a Frostburg player was tackled just three feet from the try zone, and the ball then picked up by a Bucknell player and run back 30 yards before she was brought down. It was a heartbreaking ending to the play for Frostburg, but just another example of the dominance the women's rugby team has had over other teams this fall.

"The Frostburg victory left us with a good feeling for next semester," said Steckler.

In the squad's six games this fall, the All-Blacks have totaled 130 points, including the 32-0 defeat at the hands of Princeton three games ago. Their one-loss season made for an outstanding record in the realm of club and varsity sport comparisons alike.

Other than Frostburg, the squad has shut out teams from Juniata, Penn, and Shippensburg in 1992. The outstanding defensive performances against the University of Pennsylvania and Shippensburg were especially important since they came against division opponents in the Eastern Pennsylvania Rugby Union.

If this semester's dominance is any indication, many more victories lie ahead in the Bucknell club rugby's spring season, which officially kicks off next March.

Crew wins four first-place medals in Philadelphia

BUCKNELLIAN
TEAM CORRESPONDENT

The temperature hardly got above forty degrees last Saturday at the aptly-named Frostbite Regatta in Philadelphia. Nonetheless, the Bison men's and women's crew teams rowed right through chilly headwinds and choppy water to capture four first-place medals. The teams competed against such worthies as Temple, Penn, and LaSalle, as well as Patriot League rivals Lehigh and Lafayette.

The competition rounded out the crew season for the fall.

Both the novice women's and the novice men's "A" boats won their respective events, repeating their stellar performances from the Occoquan two weeks earlier. The fall's novices have easily been the most successful in Bison crew history.

"Both the men and the women show enormous potential for the spring," remarked men's captain Edward Williams '93.

The fall's novices have easily been the most successful in Bison crew history.

The men's "B" boat and women's "B" and "C" boats competed in the freshman/novice events as well.

The varsity women, meanwhile, refused to be outdone by the novices. By placing first in both the eight and the four, they made up for their average performance at the Occoquan two weeks ago.

Mieke Zylstra '94, Robin Black '95, Megan Buehler '94, and Tiffany Flexer '94 rowed with both the four and the eight, and proudly displayed their two gold medals. A second women's four competed as well, placing third in their heat.

Both the varsity lightweight men's eight and the varsity lightweight men's four placed an impressive second in their respective events. The four faced a discouraging psychological setback when, due to a schedule conflict with another event, they were unable to compete in their regular racing shell.

The varsity heavyweight four finished third to LaSalle and Lehigh after leading for the first half of the race. The JV men's four also placed third, defeating Patriot League foe Lafayette.

Encouraged by some races and less so by others, the Bucknell crew teams are looking ahead to their spring seasons. The rowers and coxswains will begin a grueling program of land workouts, including weight training, erging, and running in preparation for next semester.

direction that the I.O.C. is moving, based on the participation of the Dream Team. In sports like basketball, baseball, and hockey there really is no world tournament that can compete with the Olympics. So why shouldn't we have the best there? Sure, traditional thinking says that the Olympics were meant for amateurs, but things change. There used to be nine to a side in basketball, and it also took eight balls to draw a walk in baseball. These sports moved on, and for the better. I think the trend toward allowing professionals in the Olympics also represents a change for the better.

If you found that you couldn't get enough of Monsieurs Barkley, Jordan, Ewing et al pouring it on against world powers like Angola and Puerto Rico (sorry, Amigo), then you are going to love the likely future of the Olympic games.

Did you burst into a rousing refrain of "America the Beautiful" after the United States Olympic golf—I mean basketball—team whipped its "opponent" 140-2? Then what will you do when Nolan Ryan takes the hill wearing red, white, and blue? Or when Jeremy Roenick and Brian Leetch take to the ice together? Or when Fred Couples strolls to the first tee?

Professional baseball, hockey, and golf associations are currently mulling over ideas on how to get their athletes into medal contention. The National Hockey League is considering following in the footsteps of the European leagues which shut down play for about three weeks to allow players to participate in the Olympics.
